

1-1-2012

Jurisprudence that Necessarily Embodies Moral Judgment: The Eighth Amendment, Catholic Teaching, and Death Penalty Discourse

Kurt M. Denk

Boston College Law School, kdenk@kramerlevin.com

Follow this and additional works at: <http://lawdigitalcommons.bc.edu/lspf>

 Part of the Civil Rights and Discrimination Commons, Courts Commons, Human Rights Law Commons, and the Law and Society Commons

Recommended Citation

Kurt M. Denk. "Jurisprudence that Necessarily Embodies Moral Judgment: The Eighth Amendment, Catholic Teaching, and Death Penalty Discourse." Notre Dame Law Review 88, no.1 (2012): 323-394.

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @ Boston College Law School. It has been accepted for inclusion in Boston College Law School Faculty Papers by an authorized administrator of Digital Commons @ Boston College Law School. For more information, please contact nick.szydowski@bc.edu.

JURISPRUDENCE THAT NECESSARILY EMBODIES MORAL JUDGMENT: THE EIGHTH AMENDMENT, CATHOLIC TEACHING, AND DEATH PENALTY DISCOURSE

KURT M. DENK*

ABSTRACT

Despite obvious differences, certain historical and conceptual underpinnings of Catholic death penalty teaching parallel core elements of U.S. death penalty jurisprudence, particularly given the Supreme Court's expansive yet contested moral reasoning in Kennedy v. Louisiana, which stressed that Eighth Amendment analysis “necessarily embodies a moral judgment.”¹ This Article compares that jurisprudence with the Catholic Church's present, near-absolute opposition to capital punishment, assessing how the death penalty, as a quintessential law and morality question, implicates overlapping sources of moral reasoning. It then identifies substantive concepts that permit Eighth Amendment jurisprudence and the Catholic perspective to be mutually translated, presenting this approach as a means to advance death penalty discourse.

* Visiting Assistant Professor, Boston College Law School; J.D., University of California, Berkeley, School of Law; M.Div., Jesuit School of Theology of Santa Clara University; M.A., Fordham University; B.A., Georgetown University. [Acknowledgments redacted.]

¹ Kennedy v. Louisiana, 554 U.S. 407, 419 (2008) (quoting Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, 382 (1972) (Burger, C. J., dissenting)).

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Introduction	3
I. Law, Morality, and Capital Punishment’s Religious Dimensions.....	6
A. Capital punishment as law and morality question	8
B. Religious dimensions, and the Catholic tradition’s relevance	11
C. Capital punishment, moral reasoning, and comparative law	18
II. U.S. Death Penalty Jurisprudence	21
A. Historical background.....	22
B. Eighth Amendment jurisprudence in Kennedy v. Louisiana	26
1. Kennedy ’s moral tone and context.....	26
2. Moral reasoning and Eighth Amendment doctrine	29
3. Moral reasoning and Eighth Amendment application	35
a) Moralizing the objective indicia analysis	36
b) Human dignity as a moral reasoning value.....	39
c) Reprise of punishment’s purposes	44
III. Catholic Death Penalty Teaching.....	47
A. Historical background.....	48
B. Present Catholic teaching	51
C. Catholic teaching as jurisprudence	54
1. Summary of meta-juridical themes.....	55
2. Development of doctrine	58
IV. Advancing Death Penalty Discourse	62
A. Development of doctrine and evolving standards of decency	62
B. Translation for discourse	66

INTRODUCTION

The legal implications of religion's often contested presence in the public square remain at the forefront of national consciousness, as evidenced by debate over the Supreme Court's recent decision in Hosanna-Tabor Evangelical Lutheran Church v. EEOC.² This is no less true with the death penalty. As Professor David Garland has argued, "religiosity and moralism" are among "recurring themes that feature prominently in the American public sphere [and] ... ha[ve] a bearing on the punishment of offenders and on death penalty politics."³ Accordingly, "[t]o understand today's American death penalty ... we must try to see its moral power, its emotional appeal, its claim to be doing justice."⁴

In comparing U.S. jurisprudence with Catholic death penalty teaching, this Article aims to contribute to such understanding.⁵ Four years after Baze v. Rees ended a brief, de facto national moratorium on executions,⁶ the moral, including religious, dimensions of capital punishment remain both poignant and contested.⁷

² Hosanna-Tabor Evangelical Lutheran Church and School v. EEOC, ___ S. Ct. ____, 2012 WL 75047 (Jan. 11, 2012) (holding that the First Amendment's Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses bar employment discrimination suits by ministers against churches). Professor Michael Stokes Paulsen praised the ruling as "absolutely, completely right" and "a dramatic defense of religious liberty." Hosanna in the Highest!, PUBLIC DISCOURSE: ETHICS, LAW, AND THE COMMON GOOD, <http://www.thepublicdiscourse.com/2012/01/4541> (Jan. 13, 2012). On the other side of the public square, The New York Times editorialized that "[t]he [C]ourt's conception of the ministerial role is more encompassing than it has been defined by state and federal appellate courts," and that its "sweeping deference to churches does not serve them or society wisely." The Ministerial Exception, Editorial, N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 13, 2012, at A22.

³ DAVID GARLAND, PECULIAR INSTITUTION: AMERICA'S DEATH PENALTY IN AN AGE OF ABOLITION 175 (2010).

⁴ Id. at 7.

⁵ Concerning this Article's definitions of jurisprudence and of Catholic teaching, see, respectively, notes 63 and 218-21, infra, and accompanying text.

⁶ Baze v. Rees, 553 U.S. 35, 40-41 (2008) (plurality opinion), upheld Kentucky's three-drug lethal injection protocol, similar to what all jurisdictions employing it then used. Litigation akin to that in Baze led to a de facto national moratorium on executions from September 2007 until shortly after Baze was decided in April 2008. Death Penalty in Flux, DEATH PENALTY INFORMATION CENTER (hereinafter, DPIC), <http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/death-penalty-flux> (last visited Sept. 20, 2011).

⁷ This Article largely adopts the definition of "moral" as "relating to principles of right and wrong in behavior," "expressing or teaching a conception of right behavior," and/or pertaining to that which is "sanctioned by or operative on one's conscience or ethical

In declaring last November that he would permit no executions to proceed while still in office, Oregon Governor John Kitzhaber explained that he “cannot participate ... in something [he] believe[s] to be morally wrong.”⁸ In March 2011, longtime death penalty supporter Governor Pat Quinn expressly acknowledged his Catholic faith in forming his decision to sign a bill abolishing the Illinois death penalty.⁹ Whether coincidental or not, the state that abandoned the death penalty prior to Illinois was New Mexico, in 2009, where analysts cited strong religious opposition behind abolition, and where the governor who signed the legislation, Bill Richardson, is also Catholic.¹⁰ New Mexico’s predecessor in repeal was New Jersey, in 2007, where death penalty opposition by the Catholic Church—the state’s largest denomination—also was among pro-abolition forces.¹¹

Religion does impact public thinking about capital punishment. According to the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, 62% of Americans support capital punishment for murder, and while 22% “with an opinion about the death penalty ... cite their education as [the] most important” factor, 19% “say that religion is the most important influence on their thinking.”¹² Religiousness per se does not necessarily predict a given view: majorities of white evangelicals, mainline Protestants, and Catholics favor the death penalty; majorities of black Protestants and Hispanic Catholics do not. But 32% of death penalty opponents—and 31% of judgment” or is “perceptual or psychological ... in nature or effect.” MERRIAM-WEBSTER, <http://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/moral> (last visited Dec. 2, 2011).

⁸ Press Release, Governor John Kitzhaber, Governor Kitzhaber issues reprieve—calls for action on capital punishment (Nov. 22, 2011), http://governor.oregon.gov/Gov/media_room/press_releases/p2011/press_112211.shtml.

⁹ Samuel G. Freedman, Faith Was on the Governor’s Shoulder, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 26, 2011, at A15. Eight years before, Governor George Ryan commuted all Illinois death sentences, also sharing “that his personal religious beliefs deeply influenced his thinking about the [death penalty’s] injustice.” Erik C. Owens and Eric P. Elshtain, Religion and Capital Punishment: An Introduction 2, in RELIGION AND THE DEATH PENALTY: A CALL FOR RECKONING (Erik C. Owens, John D. Carlson & Eric P. Elshtain eds. 2004).

¹⁰ Carol S. Steiker & Jordan M. Steiker, Cost and Capital Punishment: A New Consideration Transforms an Old Debate, 2010 U. CHI. LEGAL F. 117, 121-22 (2010).

¹¹ Martin J. Martin, Killing Capital Punishment in New Jersey: The First State in Modern History to Repeal its Death Penalty Statute, 41 U. TOL. L. REV. 485, 498-99 & nn.100, 109 (2010).

¹² THE PEW FORUM ON RELIGION AND PUBLIC LIFE, PUBLIC OPINION ON THE DEATH PENALTY (Sept. 23, 2011), <http://pewforum.org/Death-Penalty/Public-Opinion-on-the-Death-Penalty.aspx>. “[F]ewer cite the media or personal experience (15% each)” and “[j]ust 7% say the views of friends or family are the most important influence.” Id.

Catholic death penalty opponents—cite religion as the top influence on their views, versus 13% among death penalty proponents.¹³

Thus a broad range of voices fill the death penalty's moral contours. Troy Davis's September 2011 execution illustrates this: his innocence claims, which various courts and Georgia's Board of Pardons and Paroles rejected, spurred 630,000 letters pleading for a stay of execution, and clemency appeals from Pope Benedict XVI, Archbishop Desmond Tutu, former President Jimmy Carter, dozens of members of Congress, and even prominent death penalty supporters.¹⁴ In his final words, Mr. Davis maintained his innocence, urged a "deeper [look] into []his case ... [to] see the truth," and closed in benediction: "For those about to take my life, may God have mercy on all of your souls. God bless you all."¹⁵

This Article offers three contributions to this discourse. Part I asserts that because the U.S. death penalty has significant religious roots and resonance, and given how enmeshed Kennedy v. Louisiana is in its moral contours, it remains a quintessential law and morality question.¹⁶ But that premise simply begs further inquiry: to what extent might religious sources of moral reasoning be relevant? Parts II and III compare U.S. death penalty jurisprudence and Catholic death penalty teaching, via critical exegesis of Kennedy as a text of judicial moral reasoning.¹⁷ This comparison focuses on both the expansiveness and limitations of

¹³ Id.

¹⁴ Peter Wilkinson, World Shocked by U.S. execution of Troy Davis, CNN.COM (Sept. 22, 2011), <http://www.cnn.com/2011/09/22/world/davis-world-reaction/>; A Grievous Wrong: The Davis case in Georgia is further proof of the barbarity of the death penalty, Editorial, N.Y. TIMES, Sept. 21, 2011, at A30.

¹⁵ Statement by Troy Davis, Sept. 21, 2011, as reprinted in John Rudolf, Troy Davis' Last Words Released by Georgia Department of Corrections, HUFFINGTONPOST, Oct. 7, 2011, http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2011/10/07/troy-davis-execution-last-words_n_1000648.html.

¹⁶ Kennedy barred the death penalty for child rape not resulting in the victim's death. 554 U.S. at 413.

¹⁷ This Article parallels or develops analyses that both pre- and post-date Kennedy. Prior to Kennedy, Professor Saby Ghoshray compared Catholic teaching with the Court's categorical bans on capital punishment for persons with mental retardation and juvenile offenders, Tracing the Moral Contours of the Evolving Standards of Decency: The Supreme Court's Capital Jurisprudence Post-Roper, 45 J. CATH. LEGAL STUD. 561, 600-06 (2006) (discussing Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002), and Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005)), while Professor Michael S. Moore studied moral reasoning dimensions in Supreme Court jurisprudence. Morality in Eighth Amendment Jurisprudence, 31 HARV. J.L. & PUB. POL'Y 47 (2008). Following Kennedy, an incisive Comment interpreted the Kennedy, buttressing the claim that Catholic teaching’s relatively recent trajectory towards near-absolute opposition to capital punishment makes it both relevant and potentially useful to the U.S. context, especially because its reasoning is not coterminous with theology. Part IV argues that “translatable” categories of moral reasoning thus permit secular and religious perspectives to be in dialogue, thereby advancing death penalty discourse.

I. LAW, MORALITY, AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT’S RELIGIOUS DIMENSIONS

For decades the Supreme Court has affirmed that the Eighth Amendment’s ban on cruel and unusual punishment, which governs a large swath of death penalty jurisprudence, “draws its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society.”¹⁸ In 2008, Kennedy v. Louisiana stressed that this jurisprudence “necessarily embodies a moral judgment.”¹⁹

Kennedy’s use of this phrase is instructive, and inspired this Article’s title. For it appears to adopt, as a principle of constitutional law, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger’s passing observation about moral judgment three dozen years prior in his dissent in Furman v. Georgia, where he remarked that “[a] punishment is inordinately cruel, in the sense [relevant to Eighth Amendment analysis,] ... chiefly as perceived by the society so characterizing it. The standard of extreme case in light of moral foundation theory, proposing that limitations of the majority’s moral reasoning are instructive vis-à-vis that theory’s potential contributions to legal practice. Colin Prince, Moral Foundation Theory and the Law, Comment, 33 Seattle U. L. Rev. 1293 (2010). More recently, Professor Mary Sigler has critiqued the moral skepticism of the Court’s Eighth Amendment jurisprudence, offering as an alternative a defense of the evolving standards of decency framework as consistent with the “political morality” proper to liberal democracy, The Political Morality of the Eighth Amendment, 8 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 403 (2011), while Professor Shandrea P. Solomon has praised Kennedy’s proportionality analysis as consistent with moral foundations of law, justice, and retributivism. National Consensus, Retributive Theory, and Foundations of Justice and Morality in Eighth Amendment Jurisprudence: A Response to Advocates of the Child Rape Death Penalty Statute in Kennedy v. Louisiana, 13 SCHOLAR 583 (2011). Professor John F. Stinneford, on the other hand, has severely criticized Kennedy’s Eighth Amendment analysis and what he characterizes as the Court’s over-reaching therein. Rethinking Proportionality Under the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause, 97 VA. L. REV. 899 (2011).

¹⁸ Id. at 419 (brackets omitted) (quoting Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 87-88, 101 (1958) (plurality opinion)); 419-20 (summarizing Eighth Amendment jurisprudence).

¹⁹ Id. at 419 (quoting Furman, 408 U.S. at 382 (Burger, C. J., dissenting)).

cruelty is not merely descriptive, but necessarily embodies a moral judgment.”²⁰ By comparison, a majority of the Court in Kennedy set forth that the Eighth Amendment “draws its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society. This is because the standard of extreme cruelty is not merely descriptive, but necessarily embodies a moral judgment.”²¹ No Supreme Court case prior to Kennedy quoted this phrase, much less presented it as central to Eighth Amendment analysis as this Article argues it does.²²

Shortly before Kennedy was decided, Professor Michael Moore argued that “Eighth Amendment jurisprudence reveals that judges continually engage in moral reasoning.”²³ Kennedy fits his thesis that this jurisprudence consists of “miniature essays in judicial philosophy, so [that] Eighth Amendment interpretation is ... theorized as a moral enterprise by [its] judges.”²⁴ And of what do its “difficult questions rooted in morality” consist?: theories of punishment, proportionality, and culpability; inquiry into whether someone “deserves” to die; and the weighing of aggravating or mitigating factors, including an offender’s own moral agency.²⁵ Such are the moral reasoning dimensions of death penalty jurisprudence. Some scholars and jurists deny the validity of judges’ moralizing— including Justice Scalia, whose views Professor Moore addresses.²⁶ But justices do decide cases

²⁰ Furman, 408 U.S. at 382 (Burger, C.J., dissenting). Concerning Furman’s precise holding, see notes ___ and accompanying text.

²¹ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419 (internal quotation marks, citations, and brackets omitted; emphasis added).

²² Kennedy’s use of the phrase has greater meaning given its later reiteration outside the death penalty context, as when the Court held that the Eighth Amendment bars life without parole sentences for nonhomicide juvenile offenders, requiring juvenile sentences to provide “some realistic opportunity to obtain release.” Graham v. Florida, 130 S. Ct. 2011, 2034 (2010). Graham—like Kennedy, written by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy—reiterated that “courts must look beyond historical conceptions to the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society ... because the standard of extreme cruelty is not merely descriptive, but necessarily embodies a moral judgment.” Id. at 2021 (internal quotation marks, citations, and alterations omitted). On November 7, 2011, the Court granted two certiorari petitions seeking to extend Graham to juveniles convicted of homicide. Miller v. Alabama, docket no. 10-9646, Jackson v. Hobbs, docket no. 10-9647.

²³ Moore, supra note 17, at 52.

²⁴ Id. at 48.

²⁵ See id. at 52 (citations and references omitted).

²⁶ See id. See also Stinneford, supra note 17, at 922 (characterizing the Court’s recent Eighth Amendment decisions, including Kennedy, as “disingenuous” and “manipulati[ve]” based on their “independent judgment,” at least in part.²⁷ This Article assesses how Kennedy does so quite expansively—even if, in some ways, with insufficient coherence.²⁸ Kennedy’s mixed bag of moral reasoning thus shows how capital punishment remains a law and morality question par excellence.

A. Capital punishment as law and morality question

Commentators routinely address capital punishment as a law and morality question. However, it is not always clear what this means. Disagreement between the Kennedy majority and dissenters thus may simply echo a broader socio-cultural “search [for] a unifying principle.”²⁹ In any event, broad social discourse is relevant to death penalty jurisprudence, which takes “the basic mores of society” into account.³⁰ But its moral dimensions still require critical analysis: when do moral intuitions give way to the moral reasoning proper to jurisprudence?

For example, New York Times editorials cite both justice and morality in repeated calls to abolish the death penalty. Following Ohio’s botched attempt in in their application of justices’ own normative judgments). The Kennedy dissent, discussed in Part II(B), also contests the Court’s deployment of its own normative judgments.

²⁷ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 421. See also id. at 434 (“[T]he Constitution contemplates that in the end our own judgment will be brought to bear on the ... acceptability of the death penalty under the Eighth Amendment.” (quoting Coker, 433 U.S. at 597 (plurality opinion); citing Simmons, 543 U.S. at 563; Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782, 797 (1982))).

(N.B.: this Article follows the practice of some authors and short-cites Roper v. Simmons as Simmons, corresponding to the name of the prevailing defendant-respondent. See, e.g., Elisabeth Semel, Reflections on Justice John Paul Stevens’s Concurring Opinion in Baze v. Rees: A Fifth Gregg Justice Renounces Capital Punishment, 43 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 783 (2010). Because some authorities relied on here short-cite it as Roper—including Kennedy—it should be noted that references to Roper or to Simmons are to the same case.)

²⁸ Professor John Stinneford in particular has criticized the Court’s Eighth Amendment jurisprudence as “wildly inconsistent” and having “gone off the rails,” The Original Meaning of “Unusual”: The Eighth Amendment as a Bar to Cruel Innovation, 102 NW. U. L. REV. 1739, 1740 (2008), recently characterizing its proportionality analysis per se as “both narrow and unprincipled.” Rethinking Proportionality, supra note 17, at 907. See also Eric Berger, In Search of a Theory of Deference: The Eighth Amendment, Democratic Pedigree, and Constitutional Decision Making, 88 WASH. U. L. REV. 1, 1 (2010) (describing “recent Eighth Amendment death penalty case law [a]s in disarray, and the confusion ... symptomatic of a larger problem in constitutional doctrine.”).

²⁹ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 437 (characterizing the Court’s Eighth Amendment case law). Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer joined Justice Kennedy’s majority opinion. Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia and Thomas joined Justice Alito’s dissent.

³⁰ Id. at 419 (quotation omitted).

2009 to execute Mr. Romell Broom by lethal injection, the Times declared that the event “reinforced that any form of capital punishment is legally suspect and morally wrong.”³¹ Twice in September 2011 alone it called for abolition. Citing Troy Davis’s execution as evidence of arbitrariness and racial and other inequities, it described the death penalty as “grotesque and immoral.”³² More recently, praising Delaware Governor Jack Markell’s decision to commute a death sentence, the Times opined that “[i]mposing the death penalty in [that] case, as in any case, would have been grossly unjust.”³³ But according to what moral code, or following upon what sort of ethical analysis, does it reach such conclusions?

Individual commentators’ reflections on capital punishment provide some clue, invoking, as they do, socially reflexive moral consciousness. Andrew Cohen of The Atlantic has affirmed “that capital punishment has a role in the American criminal justice system,” but criticizes capital jurisdictions’ willingness to overlook “rule of law” restraints on its use, observing that “[i]n America we aim to give the guilty more justice than they deserve. We do so because of how that reflects upon us, not about how it reflects upon the guilty. And when we fail to do so it says more about us than it does about the condemned.”³⁴ Subsequently summarizing a 2011 year-end report pegging death penalty support at its lowest level, and opposition at its highest, in nearly forty years, Cohen opined that more people know in their hearts to be true[that t]he death penalty experiment is failing yet again. Undermined by overzealous prosecutors, a hobby-horse for incurious politicians, too often taken unseriously by jurors and witnesses, capital punishment in America has devolved since 1976 into a costly, inaccurate, racially biased, and unseemly proposition.³⁵

³¹ There Is No ‘Humane’ Execution, Editorial, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 14, 2009, at A30.

³² An Indefensible Punishment: The death penalty, unjust and arbitrary, cannot be made to conform to the Constitution, Editorial, N.Y. TIMES, Sept. 26, 2011, at A28. The Times also called for abolition given statistics indicating racism in the military death penalty. The Military and the Death Penalty, Editorial, N.Y. TIMES, Sept. 1, 2011, at A28.

³³ A Death Penalty Commutation, Editorial, N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 18, 2012, at A20.

³⁴ Andrew Cohen, The Death Penalty: Why We Fight for Equal Justice, THE ATLANTIC (Sept. 19, 2011), <http://www.theatlantic.com/national/archive/2011/09/the-death-penalty-why-we-fight-for-equal-justice/245101/>.

³⁵ Andrew Cohen, The Looming Death of the Death Penalty, THE ATLANTIC (Dec. 15, 2011), <http://www.theatlantic.com/national/archive/2011/12/the-looming-death-of-the-death-penalty/249969/> (citing DPIC, THE DEATH PENALTY IN 2011: YEAR END REPORT (Dec. 2011), http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/documents/2011__Year__End.pdf).

Professor Ty Alper provocatively argued that two executions on the same night highlighted the death penalty's immorality: Troy Davis's, and, in Texas, that of Lawrence Brewer, a white supremacist convicted of killing James Byrd, Jr., a black man, by tying him to the back of his truck and dragging him to death.³⁶ Conceding the grotesqueness of Mr. Brewer's crime and his unquestionable guilt, Alper quoted Mr. Byrd's own sister's words: "If I saw [Brewer] face to face, I'd tell him I forgive him for what he did. Otherwise I'd be like him."³⁷ Proceeding to compare capital punishment to slavery in its "moral[] abhorren[ce]," Alper predicted—in words similar to Cohen's—that "[y]ears from now ... the death penalty will be condemned because of what it reflects about us, not the individuals the state has killed in our name."³⁸ Justice John Paul Stevens seems to have concluded as much when he argued that the Court's decision in Baze would simply "generate [more] debate not only about [lethal injection protocols] constitutionality ... but also about the justification for the death penalty itself."³⁹

A salient implication of all such critical observations, however, is that asserting the death penalty's status as a law and morality question is one thing. Teasing out what categories of reasoning frame its moral dimensions is another. Against the backdrop of the preceding observations, in what sense does capital punishment reflect upon our society? Or, in what sense is it like slavery, grotesque and immoral, or a moral and practical failure—or not? Taken together, in what ³⁶ Ty Alper, Why the Execution of a White Supremacist Murderer Matters Too, HUFF POST CRIME (Sept. 25, 2011), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/ty-alper/why-the-execution-of-a-wh_b_980122.html.

³⁷ Id. (quoting Ms. Byrd).

³⁸ Id.

³⁹ Baze, 553 U.S. at 71 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment). As Professor Elisabeth Semel perceptively observes, "[a]ny analysis of Justice Stevens's rejection of capital punishment in Baze cannot lose sight of the fact that his vote was indispensable to the Court's revival of the death penalty in 1976." Semel, supra note 27, at 787.

Moreover, addressing the American Law Institute's 2009 withdrawal of its Model Penal Code's death penalty section, referencing "intractable institutional and structural obstacles to ensuring a minimally adequate system for administering capital punishment," Message from ALI Director Lance Liebman, AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE (Oct. 23, 2009), http://www.ali.org/_news/10232009.htm (citing Report of the Council to the Membership of the American Law Institute on the Matter of the Death Penalty, AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE (Apr. 15, 2009), http://www.ali.org/doc/Capital_Punishment_web.pdf), Professor Samuel Gross observed that new law students will "learn that this ... group of smart lawyers and judges—the ones whose work they read every day—has said that the death penalty in the United States is a moral and practical failure." Adam Liptak, Group Gives Up Death Penalty Work, N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 5, 2010, at A11 (quoting Professor Gross).

sense might such discourse reflect “the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society[?]”⁴⁰

B. Religious dimensions, and the Catholic tradition’s relevance

As Part III argues, Catholic death penalty teaching can engage such questions because it employs categories of reasoning directly on point.⁴¹ Before testing that premise, a poignant historical irony adds color to it. On the same day in April 2008, the Supreme Court decided Baze v. Rees and heard argument in Kennedy v. Louisiana. All having voted to affirm Kentucky’s lethal injection protocol, the Court’s then-five Catholic justices—Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas, and Samuel A. Alito—proceeded to a White House dinner honoring Pope Benedict XVI on his first official visit to the U.S. as pope.⁴² This was an ironic capstone to the justices’ day, as the Catholic Church is among the most visible of religious bodies to criticize the contemporary death penalty, and specifically in the United States.⁴³

Whether Catholic critique of capital punishment affects individual justices’ jurisprudence is interesting as a speculative matter, especially because Catholics are now a 6-3 majority on the Court.⁴⁴ It may well be irrelevant, in the sense that,

⁴⁰ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419 (quotation omitted).

⁴¹ Catholics make up approximately 23.9% of the U.S. population. THE PEW FORUM ON RELIGION & PUBLIC LIFE, U.S. RELIGIOUS LANDSCAPE SURVEY, SUMMARY OF KEY FINDINGS (June 2008) (available at <http://religions.pewforum.org/reports>).

Two terminological notes: first, this Article employs church as an adjective, Church as a noun, which in most instances here abbreviates the “Roman Catholic Church,” this Article’s focus. This is not meant to overlook that the Catholic Church is one among many Christian Churches. Second, capitalization (Church vs. church) can imply certain theological premises, but none are intended here as this Article is not theological per se.

⁴² Court OKs Lethal Injections; Executions Back On, ASSOCIATED PRESS (Apr. 16, 2008), http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/24158627/ns/us_news-crime_and_courts/.

⁴³ B.A. Robinson, Policies of Religious Groups Towards the Death Penalty, RELIGIOUS TOLERANCE.ORG (Apr. 10, 2009), <http://www.religioustolerance.org/execut7.htm>. See also UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS, A CULTURE OF LIFE AND THE PENALTY OF DEATH: A STATEMENT OF THE UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS CALLING FOR AN END TO THE DEATH PENALTY (2005) [hereinafter, USCCB].

⁴⁴ Commentators took the historically significant fact of Justice Sonia Sotomayor’s appointment in 2009, bringing the Court’s Catholic membership to an unprecedented six sitting justices, as an occasion to address the relevance of justices’ religious affiliation. See, e.g., Frances Kissling, Are Six Catholics Too Many for the Supreme Court?, SALON, May 31, 2009, http://www.salon.com/opinion/feature/2009/05/31/supreme_court/ (last as Justice Scalia once quipped in his inimitable way, “[j]ust as there is no ‘Catholic’ way to cook a hamburger, I am hard-pressed to tell you of a single opinion of mine that would have come out differently if I were not Catholic.”⁴⁵ But suppose Catholic teaching does affect jurists’ personal reflection, even as they presumably prescind from applying it in a formal sense?⁴⁶ Or, that it affects moral reflection on the death penalty by many among the near one-quarter of Americans who are Catholic, which research suggests is true.⁴⁷ The questions then become: how does Catholic teaching affect such reflection; and how might Catholic teaching thus be relevant, analytically speaking, to the broad backdrop of U.S. death penalty jurisprudence? This Article engages this second, analytical inquiry.

But is this even an appropriate topic? Catholic death penalty teaching consists of normative claims and moral arguments that church authorities hope will be considered in public policy decision-making.⁴⁸ In contrast, U.S. death penalty jurisprudence consists of complex bodies of statutory and constitutional law. So understood, one could argue that academic comparison of the Catholic and U.S. death penalty approaches is conceptually problematic, while applying certain visited Dec. 14, 2011). See also Joan Alpert, Religion & the Supreme Court: five Catholics. Two Protestants. Two Jews. Do the religious beliefs of justices influence their legal opinions?, MOMENT (September/October 2008).

⁴⁵ Antonin Scalia, address at Villanova University, Oct. 16, 2007 (quoted in David O’Reilly, Scalia Opines on Faith and Justice, PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER, Oct. 17, 2007, at B5.) See also Alpert, supra note 44 (noting that “Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who frequently disagrees with Scalia, fell firmly into line with him on this one, saying in January 2008 that, if the Jews who preceded her on the Court were known as ‘Jewish justices,’ she and [Justice Stephen G.] Breyer, by contrast ‘are justices who happen to be Jews.’”).

⁴⁶ Does Justice Scalia’s denial just beg the question? Compare George Kannar, The Constitutional Catechism of Antonin Scalia, 99 YALE L.J. 1297 (1990) (speculating how a structured, traditional pre-Vatican II Catholic upbringing affected Justice Scalia’s jurisprudence), with Donald L. Beschle, Catechism or Imagination: Is Justice Scalia’s Judicial Style Typically Catholic?, 37 VILL. L. REV. 1329 (1992) (disputing the characterization of Justice Scalia’s judicial style as prototypically Catholic).

⁴⁷ See notes 12-13, supra, and accompanying text.

⁴⁸ See, e.g., USCCB, supra note 43, at 6:

As leaders of a community of faith and as participants in our democracy, we are committed to contribute to a growing civil dialogue and reassessment of the use of th[e] ultimate punishment. The death penalty arouses deep passions and strong convictions. People of goodwill disagree. In these reflections, we offer neither judgment nor condemnation but instead encourage engagement and dialogue, which we hope may lead to re-examination and conversion. Our goal is not just to proclaim a position, but to persuade Catholics and others to join us in working to end the use of the death penalty.

conclusions arising from this descriptive exercise would be constitutionally suspect.⁴⁹ Yet, per the First Amendment, citizens may be religious, and express religious views in the public square.⁵⁰ Religious bodies' stances on broad social questions are therefore relevant, capital punishment being an example.

Indeed, beside the fact that religion affects many Americans' views on the death penalty,⁵¹ 92% of U.S. adults "believe in the existence of God or a universal spirit," with 56% describing religion in their lives as "very important" and 26% describing it as "somewhat important."⁵² Thus, inasmuch as "the 'spirit of religion' remains a powerful force in shaping the views and values of the American people,"⁵³ religious sources of moral reasoning inform many citizens' moral judgments.⁵⁴ Given that context, and because death penalty jurisprudence ⁴⁹ U.S. CONST., amend. I ("Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof . . ."). "The Religion Clauses apply to the States by incorporation into the Fourteenth Amendment." Elk Grove Unified School Dist. v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1, 8 n.4 (citing Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940)).

⁵⁰ U.S. CONST., amend. I ("Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech . . ."). First Amendment protections of speech are likewise enforced against state action per the Fourteenth Amendment. Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 666 (1925). As Professor William Marshall has argued, the free exercise of religion bears directly on the freedom of speech, and both have proper public dimensions—the "freedom of expression and free exercise provid[ing] a unitary protection for individual liberty." William P. Marshall, Solving the Free Exercise Dilemma: Free Exercise as Expression, 67 MINN. L. REV. 545, 546 (1982-1983) (reference omitted).

⁵¹ See notes 12-13, supra, and accompanying text.

⁵² THE PEW FORUM ON RELIGION & PUBLIC LIFE, U.S. RELIGIOUS LANDSCAPE SURVEY, RELIGIOUS BELIEFS AND PRACTICES: DIVERSE AND POLITICALLY RELEVANT 5, 23 (June 2008) (available at <http://religions.pewforum.org/pdf/report2-religious-landscape-study-full.pdf>).

⁵³ Id. at 1 (quoting Alexis de Tocqueville's reading of our early republic).

⁵⁴ Concerning correlation of rates of religious belief to religious tenets' influence on moral reasoning, 78% of U.S. adults "agree that there are clear and absolute standards of right and wrong;" 29% "cite religious teachings and beliefs as their biggest influence." Id. at 62. A larger share, 52%, "says that they look most to practical experience and common sense when it comes to questions of right and wrong," but concerning sources of moral reasoning apart from personal experience, the 29% who cite religion dwarfs the 9% who cite "philosophy and reason," and the 5% who cite "scientific information." Id. (The remaining 4% fall in the "don't know" or no-answer categories. Id.) That being said, the Pew survey also—and unsurprisingly—"confirms the close link between Americans' religious affiliation, beliefs and practices, on the one hand, and their social and political attitudes, on the other. . . . The relationship between religion and politics is particularly strong with respect to political ideology and views on [certain] social issues . . ." Id. at 3.

both engages social mores and “necessarily embodies a moral judgment,”⁵⁵ religious moral reasoning’s methodological orientation may assist in framing certain issues that that jurisprudence entails. To this point, Professors Paul H. Robinson and John M. Darley have cited research indicating that “most judgments about criminal liability and punishment for serious wrongdoing are intuitional rather than reasoned.”⁵⁶ To the extent that intuitions about justice also are both highly nuanced and widely shared across diverse demographic groups,⁵⁷ various frames of moral reasoning, including religious ones, may foster critical reflection on otherwise-inchoate intuitions concerning capital punishment.

Religion’s relevance stems from two further observations relating broad public attitudes to jurisprudence per se. First, although moral reasoning is not the exclusive domain of religion or theology, the latter employ forms of moral reasoning. Various authors have surveyed the terrain of religion, morality, and law.⁵⁸ The point to stress here is that jurisprudence embraces a legal system’s “fundamental elements,” which includes “its ethical significance and adequacy[,] ... bring[ing] together moral and legal philosophy.”⁵⁹ Religion has made its own contributions to jurisprudence, as Professor Harold Berman has described.⁶⁰ This ⁵⁶ Paul H. Robinson & John M. Darley, Intuitions of Justice: Implications for Criminal Law and Justice Policy, 81 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 1 (2007).

⁵⁵ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419 (quotation omitted).

⁵⁷ Id. at 57.

⁵⁸ See, e.g., LAW AND RELIGION IN THEORETICAL AND HISTORICAL CONTEXT (Peter Cane, Carolyn Evans, & Zoë Robinson eds., 2008); MARTHA NUSSBAUM, LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE: IN DEFENSE OF AMERICA’S TRADITION OF RELIGIOUS EQUALITY (2008); MICHAEL J. PERRY, RELIGION IN POLITICS: CONSTITUTIONAL AND MORAL PERSPECTIVES (1997); JOHN WITTE, JR., AND JOEL A. NICHOLS, RELIGION AND THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL EXPERIMENT (3d. ed. 2011); Michael S. Moore, Four Reflections on Law and Morality, 48 WM. & MARY L. REV. 1523 (2006).

⁵⁹ BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY 711 (Bryan A. Garner, ed., abridged 8th ed. 2005) (defining “jurisprudence,” “ethical jurisprudence,” and “general jurisprudence”). See also HAROLD J. BERMAN, LAW AND REVOLUTION: THE FORMATION OF THE WESTERN LEGAL TRADITION vi-vii (1983) (describing positivist jurisprudence’s analytical persuasion and expressly political implications; natural law jurisprudence’s theoretical, moral-philosophical bent; and historicist jurisprudence’s focus on social theory).

⁶⁰ See generally BERMAN, supra note 59, Part I: The Papal Revolution and the Canon Law (theorizing that law in the West underwent its most significant changes as a result of six revolutions, beginning with the “Papal Revolution” of 1075-1122, which coincided with the Gregorian Reform in the Catholic Church and its “new canon law”—itself the first modern legal system in the West—from which followed a host of secular legal systems that are predecessors of those we have today).

Article explores Kennedy's moral and legal philosophy in its interface with a deep “integrative jurisprudence” that “emphasize[s] that law has to be believed in or it will not work; [that] it involves not only reason and will but also emotion, intuition, and faith.”⁶¹ Because U.S. death penalty jurisprudence necessarily embodies moral judgment, it implicates such an integrative jurisprudence, existing against a cultural, historical, and legal backdrop suffused with religion.

Second, religion is salient to death penalty jurisprudence given its own deep religious roots. To start, it would be difficult to overstate the influence of the Bible’s lex talionis on Western moral norms regarding capital punishment. The classical statement of the lex talionis appears in Exodus 21:23-24: “[where] damage ensues, the penalty shall be life for life”⁶² That influence also entails certain ambiguities, scholars noting that Jewish and Christian Scriptures’ views on the death penalty cut both ways, as it were.⁶³ Many conclude, especially given modern historical-critical interpretation, that biblical texts taken as a whole are ⁶¹ BERMAN, supra note 59, at vii. Analogously, but with respect to capital punishment, Professor David Garland has characterized his recent study of the American death penalty as “a ‘law and society’ project that works in [two] directions—studying a social context to better understand a legal institution, but also using a legal institution to better understand society.” GARLAND, supra note 3, at 16.

⁶² TANAKH: A NEW TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES ACCORDING TO THE TRADITIONAL HEBREW TEXT (Jewish Publication Society, 1985). See also id., Genesis 9:6 (“Whoever sheds the blood of man, [b]y man shall his blood be shed; For in His image [d]id God make man.”). For a detailed analysis of the lex talionis, see David Daube, Lex Talionis, in STUDIES IN BIBLICAL LAW 102 (1947, 1969; as reprinted in 3 BIBLICAL LAW AND LITERATURE 203 (Calum Carmichael ed., Collected Works of David Daube, 2003)).

⁶³ Compare E. CHRISTIAN BRUGGER, CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AND ROMAN CATHOLIC MORAL TRADITION 60-62 (2003) (citing numerous death penalty prescriptions in the Torah), with JAMES J. MEGIVERN, THE DEATH PENALTY: AN HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL SURVEY 12 (1997) (arguing that procedural and other protections in Jewish law effectively, and quite considerably, narrowed the death penalty’s applicable scope).

The Christian Scriptures, or New Testament, also equivocate. In Matthew’s Gospel Jesus affirms some commandments of the Mosaic law concerning killing and retaliation, but contravenes others. Matthew 5:38-39a, 43-44, NEW AMERICAN BIBLE (Donald Senior, et al., trans. and eds. 1990) (“You have heard that it was said, ‘[a]n eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.’ But I say to you, offer no resistance to one who is evil . . . [and] [y]ou have heard that it was said, ‘[y]ou shall love your neighbor and hate your enemy.’ But I say to you, love your enemies, and pray for those who persecute you”). But in Romans 13:1-4, Saint Paul starkly defends the death penalty: “Let every person be subordinate to the higher authorities, for there is no authority except from God, and those that exist have been established by God. . . . But if you do evil, be afraid, for [authority] does not bear the sword without purpose; it is the servant of God to inflict wrath on the evildoer.”

equivocal about the death penalty.⁶⁴ Early Christians may have been ambivalent in their own attitudes, as they would have interpreted biblical texts in light of the fact that Jesus' execution was central to their belief, and that many of them faced the same fate as a persecuted minority in the pre-Constantine Roman Empire.⁶⁵

The Bible's influence on capital punishment certainly survived antiquity: millennia-worth of its defenders have cited the Bible for its justification, from ancient Israelites, to Christian authorities, to modern citizens.⁶⁶ Also, religious views on the death penalty evolved just as church and state developed, in tandem and in tension, together with their respective legal systems:⁶⁷ "basic institutions, concepts, and values of Western legal systems have their sources in religious rituals, liturgies, and doctrines of the eleventh and twelfth centuries," including "attitudes toward death, sin, punishment, [and] forgiveness."⁶⁸ Even if "religious attitudes and assumptions have changed fundamentally" since then, "legal institutions, concepts, and values that have derived from them still survive, often unchanged."⁶⁹ Indeed, executions remain highly ritualized, even quasi-religious.⁷⁰

Professor Stuart Banner has portrayed how religious intuitions powerfully informed this nation's earliest death penalty.⁷¹ "Terror, Blood, and Repentance," ⁶⁴ Richard H. Hiers, The Death Penalty and Due Process in Biblical Law, 81 U. DET. MERCY L. REV. 751, 834 (2004).

⁶⁵ MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 19.

⁶⁶ BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 60; MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 9. See also Robinson, supra note 43 (citing the Southern Baptist Church Assembly's recent declaration, based on biblical reference, of "God[']s authoriz[ation of] capital punishment for murder after the Noahic Flood, validating its legitimacy in human society." (citation omitted)).

⁶⁷ BERMAN, supra note 59, at 50, 87 (observing that legal systems per se developed in both the church and in secular states in the early twelfth century and after, with "[t]he creation of modern legal systems [being], in the first instance, a response to revolutionary change within the church and in the relation of the church to the secular authorities.").

⁶⁸ Id. at 165.

⁶⁹ Id.

⁷⁰ Leigh B. Bienan, Anomalies: Ritual and Language in Lethal Injection Regulations, 35 FORDHAM URB. L.J. 857, 872 (2008) (describing "rituals and traditions" of U.S. executions, including "statements regarding the prisoner's choice of his method of death, his choice of his final meal, the visit of the religious figure, the solicitation of repentance, the reporting of the prisoner's last words, and the donning of ceremonial clothes.").

⁷¹ STUART BANNER, THE DEATH PENALTY: AN AMERICAN HISTORY 5-23 (2002).

the first chapter in his history of the U.S. death penalty, concludes by poignantly observing that the death penalty in the colonial and early national eras “fulfilled the moral expectations of most colonial Americans.”⁷² Others have documented religion’s influence on capital punishment well into the present.⁷³ And the relevance (or not) of religious moral reasoning even extends to Supreme Court jurisprudence: Justice Stevens cited anti-death penalty amici briefs filed by U.S. religious communities in 2002 in Atkins v. Virginia, which barred the death penalty for persons who have mental retardation.⁷⁴

On the other hand, Chief Justice Roberts’s plurality opinion in Baze v. Rees noted that, while “[r]easonable people of good faith disagree on the morality and efficacy of capital punishment,” the precise questions before the Court often require distinguishing the constitutionality of execution procedures from “moral[or] religious” perspectives on the death penalty.⁷⁵ But what of the moral judgment that, per a majority in Kennedy, necessarily informs death penalty jurisprudence?⁷⁶ Furor over Troy Davis’s execution signals this question about death penalty jurisprudence’s precise moral contours.⁷⁷ For example, when courts conclude that review of an innocence claim has met due process requirements, yet substantial questions remain about the defendant’s guilt and/or matters like the role of race in adjudicating it, how divorced is the constitutionality of procedure from capital punishment’s morality per se, especially given the notion that “death is different”?⁷⁸ This Article explores the death penalty as law and morality question, in light of religious and secular moral norms, and the law’s own normative values.

⁷² Id. at 23.

⁷³ See generally, e.g., Owens et al., supra note 9; THE PEW FORUM, supra note 12; Robert F. Drinan, Religious Organizations and the Death Penalty, 9 WM. & MARY BILL RTS. J. 171 (2000).

⁷⁴ Atkins, 536 U.S. at 316 n.21 (citing opposition to the death penalty for mentally retarded persons by “widely diverse religious communities within the United States”).

⁷⁵ Baze, 553 U.S. at 61, 41 (plurality opinion) (quotation omitted).

⁷⁶ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419.

⁷⁷ See, e.g., Cohen, supra note 34 (critically observing, in the wake of Mr. Davis’s case and that of Duane Buck, whose execution was blocked by the Supreme Court in a rebuke to Texas’s handling of racial testimony by an expert witness, that fighting against condemned inmates’ relief “is saying that [a state’s] interest in the finality of its capital judgments is more important than the accuracy of its capital verdicts.”).

⁷⁸ See Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 188 (1976) (plurality opinion) (observing that “[w]hile ... the infliction of the death penalty [does not] per se violate[] the Constitution’s

C. Capital punishment, moral reasoning, and comparative law

In studying the death penalty this way, this Article employs insights from comparative law, which asks whether different legal systems or traditions so diverge as to preclude substantive comparison.⁷⁹ As Professor Esin Öricü argues, “[c]omparative law is about communication, and, by providing [a] language [for it,] ... allows legal scholars to enter into holistic communication.”⁸⁰ Facilitating such holistic communication is the goal of comparing the moral reasoning language of U.S. death penalty jurisprudence, via Kennedy v. Louisiana, with Catholic death penalty teaching. Especially because the latter envisions itself as speaking “beyond the confines of the Catholic community, ... [to a] global audience of ‘all people of good will,’”⁸¹ such a comparison can support robust discourse about capital punishment’s moral contours today.⁸² But because skepticism concerning these premises may remain, following is a juxtaposition of a critical passage from Kennedy with a synopsis of Catholic teaching.⁸³ This reveals several similarities, supporting the claim that substantive comparison is feasible.

ban on cruel and unusual punishments, ... the penalty of death is different in kind from any other punishment imposed under our system of criminal justice.”) (citations omitted).

⁷⁹ See generally, e.g., PETER DE CRUZ, COMPARATIVE LAW IN A CHANGING WORLD (2007); COMPARATIVE LAW IN THE 21ST CENTURY (Andrew Harding & Esin Öricü eds., 2002).

⁸⁰ Esin Öricü, Unde Venit, Quo Tendit Comparative Law?, in Harding & Öricü, supra note 79, at 15.

⁸¹ Kenneth R. Himes, Introduction, MODERN CATHOLIC SOCIAL TEACHING: COMMENTARIES & INTERPRETATIONS 5 (Kenneth R. Himes et al., eds., 2005).

⁸² Professor William Twining endorses including religious law and entities’ relevance to comparative law, Globalisation and Comparative Law, in COMPARATIVE LAW: A HANDBOOK 71 (Esin Öricü & David Nelken eds., 2007), and Professors Andrew Harding and Esin Öricü, supra note 79, at ix, argue that “comparativists[] will regard religion as part of the underlying deeply seated processes that influence the evolving shape of law.”

⁸³ Professor Peter De Cruz has identified linguistic and terminological difficulties, cultural differences, and risks of superimposing common legal patterns or one’s own lens of expectations as among the difficulties inherent in comparing different legal systems and traditions—as this Article does—but also argues that such potential pitfalls should not preclude a comparison even of vastly different entities. DE CRUZ, supra note 79, at 219.

Preliminary Comparison: *Kennedy v. Louisiana*⁸⁴ and Catholic Teaching⁸⁵

Kennedy

[T]he Eighth Amendment's protection against excessive or cruel and unusual punishments flows from the basic precept of justice that punishment for a crime should be graduated and proportioned to the offense. Whether this requirement has been fulfilled is determined . . . by the norms that currently prevail[, and] . . . from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society. This is because the standard of extreme cruelty is not merely descriptive, but necessarily embodies a moral judgment. The standard itself remains the same, but its applicability must change as the basic mores of society change. Evolving standards of decency must embrace and express respect for the dignity of the person, and the punishment of criminals must conform to that rule[, being] . . . justified under one or more of three principal rationales: rehabilitation, deterrence, and retribution. It is the last of these, retribution, that most often can contradict the law's own ends. This is of particular concern . . . in capital cases. When the law punishes by death, it risks its own sudden descent into brutality, transgressing the constitutional commitment to decency and restraint. For these reasons . . . capital punishment must be limited to those offenders who commit a narrow category of the most serious crimes and whose extreme culpability makes them the most deserving of execution. Though the death penalty is not invariably unconstitutional, the Court insists upon confining the instances in which the punishment can be imposed.

A Summary of Catholic Teaching

The efforts of the state to curb the spread of behavior harmful to people's rights and to the basic rules of civil society correspond to the requirement of safeguarding the common good. Legitimate public authority has the right and the duty to inflict punishment proportionate to the gravity of the offense. Punishment has the primary aim of redressing the disorder introduced by the offense . . . [and], in addition to defending public order and protecting people's safety, has a medicinal purpose: as far as possible, it must contribute to the correction of the guilty party. Assuming that the guilty party's identity and responsibility have been fully determined, [our] traditional teaching . . . does not exclude recourse to the death penalty, if this is the only possible way of effectively defending human lives against the unjust aggressor. If, however, nonlethal means are sufficient to defend and protect people's safety from the aggressor, authority will limit itself to such means, as these are more in keeping with the concrete conditions of the common good and are more in conformity to the dignity of the human person. [The sanction of death, when it is not necessary to protect society, . . . diminishes all of us.] Today, in fact, as a consequence of the possibilities which the state has for effectively preventing crime, by rendering one who has committed an offense incapable of doing harm—without definitely taking away from him the possibility of redeeming himself—the cases in which the execution of the offender is an absolute necessity are very rare, if not practically nonexistent.

⁸⁴ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419-20 (brackets, paragraph breaks, and quotations omitted)

⁸⁵ CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH §§ 2265-67 (rev. ed., United States Catholic Conference-Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997) [hereinafter, CCC] (paragraph breaks and quotations omitted); USCCB, supra note 43, at 4 (the italicized, bracketed text above).

The preceding juxtaposition illustrates how both Eighth Amendment death penalty jurisprudence and Catholic death penalty teaching employ the language of law and morality, incorporating broad themes of jurisprudence concerning authority, tradition, the interests of civil society, and the purposes of punishment. Kennedy begins with a threshold affirmance of the death penalty's constitutionality, but articulates a firm presumption limiting its scope to a narrow category of offenders and offenses, circumscribed by notions of seriousness, extreme culpability, and moral desert. The Catholic emphasis on procedural safeguards exists alongside concern about racial bias and a diminished humanity perceived to result from excessively retributive moral intuitions. Both articulate a presumption of restraint in its application, striving to balance broad moral values with appropriate procedural rules. Moreover, a reader who did not know that the second statement is from a religious entity might assume it to be a statutory preamble or policy statement comprising part of a legislative history.

Comparative legal theory addressing law and religion can explain this phenomenon. For, notwithstanding the fact that disestablishment is a key feature of the U.S. legal system, the history of "the law" per se in the West, to which U.S. jurisprudence is an heir, is inextricably linked with religion, as Professor Berman has extensively documented.⁸⁶ If anything, that presumably is among the historical factors giving rise to the American ethos of both disestablishment and free exercise.⁸⁷ In any event, decades before Professor Berman's contribution to the field, Professor Stephan Kuttner studied the same phenomenon, characterizing as “interpenetration” the historically dialectical relationship between Catholic canon law and secular Western law.⁸⁸ This term aptly helps explain why U.S. death penalty jurisprudence and Catholic death penalty teaching—as sketched out above in preliminary form, and as the following analysis fleshes out—sound with a similar tone, if not speak in a similar tongue. The point is not that one mimics, much less replicates, the other. Rather, because they share a deep substantive tradition, their frames of moral reasoning use similar operative premises. They are, that is, translatable. As Professor David Daube has observed,

⁸⁶ See generally BERMAN, supra note 59 (documenting the Western legal tradition's emergence from the dialectical relationship between secular and religious ideas and institutions). See also JAVIER MARTÍNEZ-TORRÓN, ANGLO-AMERICAN LAW AND CANON LAW: CANONICAL ROOTS OF THE COMMON LAW TRADITION 168 (1998) (studying how religion and its "moral concepts were transplanted into the legal world").

⁸⁷ In a recent, incisive study, Professor Alan Brownstein has endorsed reading the religion clauses as "support[ing] and reinforce[ing] each other in critical ways," so as to "assign[] considerable value to the right to practice one's faith free from state interference while acknowledging that the affirmative support of religion by government risks the sacrifice of important liberty and equality interests of both believers and non-believers." The Religion Clauses as Mutually Reinforcing Mandates: Why the Arguments for Rigorously Enforcing the Free Exercise Clause and Establishment Clause Are Stronger When Both Clauses Are Taken Seriously, 32 CARDOZO L. REV. 1701, 1705 (2011). Professor Brownstein's argument is not without support. As a unanimous Supreme Court recently observed in Hosanna-Tabor, while "there can be 'internal tension ... between the Establishment Clause and the Free Exercise Clause,'" that is not always the case—e.g., where, as in Hosanna-Tabor, the government interferes with a religious group's employment of its ministers, such that the clauses operate in tandem. 2012 WL 75047 at *7 (quoting Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 677 (1971) (plurality opinion)). The Court proceeded to compare English practices with the diverse approaches to both establishment and free exercise in our colonial and early national experience, observing that the latter

[r]eligion borrows from law freely, continuously and from early on, hence can greatly enlighten us as to legal life in successive periods. Law is perhaps partially responsible for the very existence of a normative side of religion—duties, procedures, sanctions—as well as particular manifestations of it: quite compatible with equal indebtedness the other way around.⁸⁹

What, then, do U.S. death penalty jurisprudence à la Kennedy and Catholic death penalty teaching each say, and what might they say to one another?

II. U.S. DEATH PENALTY JURISPRUDENCE

No “American position” on capital punishment can be stated as succinctly as one finds in the Catholic Catechism. Its history of practice by various states and both arose from and reacted against that history, all of this being the “background [against which] the First Amendment was adopted.” Id. at 7-8. Also see generally JOHN WITTE, JR., & JOEL A. NICHOLS, RELIGION AND THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL EXPERIMENT (3d ed. 2011); KENT GREENAWALT, RELIGION AND THE CONSTITUTION (2006).

⁸⁸ Stephan Kuttner, Some Considerations of the Role of Secular Law and Institutions in the History of Canon Law, 2 SCRITTI DI SOCIOLOGIA E POLITICA IN ONORE DI LUIGI STURZO 351 (1953), reprinted in STUDIES IN THE HISTORY OF MEDIEVAL CANON LAW VI-351 (1990) (describing the “general interpenetration” of ecclesiastical and secular law from the fourth to sixteenth centuries as “fundamental” in Western legal and administrative systems and governance structures; doctrines on just war and the use of force; the development of constitutional and international law; and the law governing contracts, corporations, wills and estates, marriage, and private law). Crucially, this was a dialectical process, with components of Catholic canon law and secular Roman law influencing one another. Id. at 354-55. See also BERMAN, supra note 59, at 144 n.53, 187 n.44, 189 & n.46, 190-92 & nn.48-50, 201 & n.7, 205 n.16, 207 n.22 (citing Professor Kuttner’s work).

⁸⁹ Biblical and Postbiblical Law, in 3 BIBLICAL LAW AND LITERATURE, supra note 62, at 3.

the federal government is profoundly diverse,⁹⁰ and the constitutional framework governing those practices is “exceedingly complex,” as Justice Alito observed in Kennedy.⁹¹ (Others less euphemistically characterize Eighth Amendment jurisprudence as “embarrassing,” or “a train wreck.”⁹²) Nevertheless, it is possible to sketch a general outline of U.S. death penalty jurisprudence through reference to historical highlights, the role of the Model Penal Code’s recently withdrawn capital sentencing section (which many death penalty jurisdictions’ statutes follow to some degree⁹³), and its post-Kennedy constitutional status.

A. Historical background

Evocative of Professor Kuttner’s theory of interpenetration, early American law included “vaguely and inaccurately remembered fragments of common law, local law, Mosaic law ... and Roman law.”⁹⁴ U.S. death penalty jurisprudence likewise emerged from the Western tradition’s broad legal, political, and religious history.⁹⁵ Just as “capital punishment [remains] constitutional” in the United States today,⁹⁶ law and morality, together with religion in particular, have ⁹⁰ See generally, DPIC, Part I: History of the Death Penalty, <http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/part-i-history-death-penalty> (last visited Dec. 9, 2011).

⁹¹ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 452 (Alito, J., dissenting).

⁹² Stinneford, supra note 28, at 1740 (quotations omitted).

⁹³ See generally Russell Dean Covey, Exorcizing Wechsler’s Ghost: The Influence of the Model Penal Code on Death Penalty Sentencing Jurisprudence, 31 HASTINGS CONST. L.Q. 189 (2004).

⁹⁴ KERMIT L. HALL, PAUL FINKELMAN, & JAMES W. ELY, JR., AMERICAN LEGAL HISTORY: CASES AND MATERIALS 37 (3d ed., 2005). See also id. at 2 (“Americans created their legal order in a spirit of eclectic opportunism, drawing from various sources of law and devising new rules of law when they found nothing suitable in existing systems.”).

⁹⁵ See generally BANNER, supra note 71; DPIC, Part I: History of the Death Penalty, supra note 90 (observing that, while European settlers “brought [with them] the practice of capital punishment,” specific “death penalty [laws] varied from colony to colony,” though among the first, in Virginia in 1612, were “the Divine, Moral and Martial Laws, which provided the death penalty for even minor offenses”).

⁹⁶ Baze, 553 U.S. at 47 (plurality opinion) (citing Gregg, 428 U.S. at 177 (joint opinion of Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.)). Cf. Kennedy, 554 U.S. 420 (“Though the death penalty is not invariably unconstitutional, the Court insists on confining the instances in which the punishment can be imposed.”) (citing Gregg, 428 U.S. at 153).

been an important subtext from its earliest history to the present.⁹⁷ Owing to English common law practice, the death penalty was imposed in the colonies and the early republic for a variety of offenses against persons, property, and morality.⁹⁸ Up to the present, U.S. religious groups have stood on both sides of the death penalty debate,⁹⁹ while the beliefs of those groups continue to influence their adherents' views.¹⁰⁰ Presumably that is neither culturally insignificant nor politically irrelevant given that thirty-four states, the federal government, and the U.S. military have capital sentencing laws in force, and over 3,200 inmates occupy the nation's death rows, with California—the nation's most populous state—housing the nation's largest death row population, at over 700.¹⁰¹

Of pivotal historical and legal significance was the Supreme Court's 1972 invalidation, in Furman v. Georgia, of all existing capital sentencing schemes on the ground that its arbitrary and capricious administration violated the Eighth Amendment.¹⁰² Crucial to the decision was its invocation of "evolving standards of decency" to find unconstitutional, as administered, a sanction that had been in place for centuries.¹⁰³ Four years later, in Gregg v. Georgia and companion cases ⁹⁷ MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 299-335 (cataloguing biblical and other religious influences on capital punishment transplanted from Europe to the early American context); see also BANNER, supra note 71, ch. 1; Owens & Elshtain, supra note 9.

⁹⁸ BANNER, supra note 71, at 5-9.

⁹⁹ Robinson, supra note 43; Part II: History of the Death Penalty, DPIC, <http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/part-ii-history-death-penalty> (last visited Dec. 9, 2011) (surveying religious organizations' views on the death penalty).

¹⁰⁰ See notes 12-13, supra, and accompanying text.

¹⁰¹ DPIC, Facts About the Death Penalty (Jan. 6, 2012), <http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/documents/FactSheet.pdf>.

¹⁰² Furman's precise holding is hard to pin down, as it yielded nine opinions spanning over 200 pages. 408 U.S. at 238-470. The opinion authored by three justices four years later in Gregg v. Georgia summarized Furman as invalidating statutes prone to yield arbitrary and capricious death sentences—i.e., those which allowed "juries [to] impose[] the death sentence in a way that could only be called freakish." Gregg, 428 U.S. at 206-07 (joint opinion of Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.). Later revisiting and upholding Georgia's capital punishment statute, the Court quoted Gregg's rule that the "discretion ... afforded a sentencing body on a matter so grave as the determination of whether a human life should be taken or spared ... must be suitably directed and limited so as to minimize the risk of wholly arbitrary and capricious action." Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862, 874 (1983) (quoting Gregg, 428 U.S. at 189).

¹⁰³ Furman, 408 U.S. at 242 (Douglas, J., concurring opinion), 269-70 (Brennan, J., concurring opinion); 327, 329 (Marshall, J., concurring opinion) (all citing Trop, 356 U.S.

from Florida and Texas, the Court upheld statutes that had been revised to satisfy Furman's requirement of rationality and consistency in capital proceedings.¹⁰⁴ Rationality and consistency in weighing the ultimate punishment bespeak moral reasoning, as do "evolving standards of decency" as a substantive constitutional principle. Indeed, arguably advancing a rule that capital adjudication proceed as a moral reasoning enterprise, the Court upheld statutes that adequately channeled sentencing discretion,¹⁰⁵ but voided those providing for mandatory death sentences.¹⁰⁶ While the latter approaches may have addressed unbridled discretion, pluralities of the Court concluded they impermissibly removed the ultimate (moral?) question of death—and the individualized determination that the Court saw that that question requires—from any discretionary analysis whatsoever.¹⁰⁷

Moreover, Professor Banner has argued that capital punishment's "comeback" in popularity and practice after Gregg owed to two broad factors operative in social consciousness. First, "capital punishment was a moral imperative," an extension of the principle that "[t]he criminal law 'must remind us of the moral order by which alone we can live[.]'"¹⁰⁸ Second, this abstract notion of moral order bore overt expression in the sense that inflicting capital punishment met a need "for a collective condemnation of crime."¹⁰⁹ In both respects the revived American death penalty tapped into certain notions of moral order and the common good that also inform the Catholic worldview, as Part III will argue. Professor Banner's thesis is not stale; as Professor Garland more recently argued:

We need to think about capital punishment not as a lumbering dinosaur with an ancient physiology but instead as a mobile assemblage of practices, discourses, rituals, and representations that has evolved over time in response to the demands of the

at 101 (plurality opinion), which had applied the evolving standards of decency principle not to capital punishment, but to a statute providing for the expatriation of one convicted by military court martial, and thereafter dishonorable discharged, for wartime desertion).

¹⁰⁴ Gregg, 428 U.S. at 206-07 (joint opinion of Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.).

¹⁰⁵ See Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976); Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976).

¹⁰⁶ See Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976); Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976).

¹⁰⁷ See Woodson, 428 U.S. 280.

¹⁰⁸ BANNER, supra note 71, at 282-83 (quoting WALTER BERNS, FOR CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: CRIME AND THE MORALITY OF THE DEATH PENALTY 173 (1979)).

¹⁰⁹ Id. at 283.

social environment and the pressure of competing forces. Doing so reminds us that capital punishment has a history that shapes its forms as well as its uses. And it obliges us to take account of its contemporary incarnation—the institutional arrangements, legal procedures, discursive figures, and dramatic forms that actually exist today.¹¹⁰

Today's death penalty, then, requires analytical attention to its resonance with integrative jurisprudence, to recall Professor Berman's phrase.¹¹¹

Full analysis of current capital jurisdictions' death penalty statutes exceeds this Article's scope. However, brief discussion of Section 210.6 of the Model Penal Code (MPC) is illuminating because statutory schemes like those upheld in Gregg took their cue from it,¹¹² and many still rely, at least in part, on its framework, despite its being withdrawn by the American Law Institute in 2009.¹¹³ Germane to this Article, Section 210.6 requires factfinders to assess properly "moral" categories concerning an offender's relative depravity, culpability, and desert of the ultimate punishment. Key MPC features that are a mainstay of many statutes include its categories of death penalty-eligible homicides and mens rea specifications;¹¹⁴ its framework of aggravating and mitigating factors for weighing death versus life imprisonment;¹¹⁵ and its provision for bifurcated proceedings, which arguably focus attention on the moral weight of a sentencing decision in its own right, apart from a legal finding of guilt.¹¹⁶ Kennedy v. Louisiana approvingly referenced such frameworks with respect to capital murder, but concluded they ¹¹⁰ GARLAND, supra note 3, at 18-19.

¹¹¹ See note 61, supra, and accompanying text.

¹¹² Gregg extensively referenced the MPC. See 428 U.S. at 185, 189, 191, 194, 195 (joint opinion of Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.). On its role in capital sentencing statutes, see, e.g., BANNER, supra note 23, at 269-270; Covey, supra note 110; Robinson & Dubber, supra note 9, at 325.

¹¹³ Concerning the MPC's role in capital sentencing statutes following the American Law Institute's withdrawal of Section 210.6, see Franklin E. Zimring, Pulling the plug on capital punishment: The American Law Institute withdraws approval for standards it created, raising doubts about the legitimacy of execution, NATIONAL LAW JOURNAL, Dec. 7, 2009, available at <http://www.law.com/jsp/nlj/PubArticleNLJ.jsp?id=1202436026535&slreturn=1&hbxlogin=1> (last visited Nov. 1, 2010).

¹¹⁴ MPC § 210.2(1)-(2).

¹¹⁵ Id. § 210.6(3)-(4).

¹¹⁶ Id. § 210.6(2).

should not be applied or refashioned for purposes of nonhomicide crimes.¹¹⁷ Nonetheless, such frameworks' moral premises did carry the day in Kennedy's analysis, with sweeping effect.

B. Eighth Amendment jurisprudence in Kennedy v. Louisiana

At its core, Kennedy held that the Eighth Amendment “bars ... the death penalty for the rape of a child where the crime did not result, and was not intended to result, in death of the victim.”¹¹⁸ More broadly, and evoking without naming the lex talionis, it distinguished “between intentional first-degree murder on the one hand and nonhomicide crimes against individual persons, even including child rape, on the other,” arguing that, while “[t]he latter crimes may be devastating in their harm,” they are unequal to homicide “‘in terms of moral depravity and of the injury to the person and to the public.’”¹¹⁹ The Court thus did not limit its moral analysis to the petitioner or those like him, but applied an expansive moral reasoning. As Professor Elisabeth Semel has argued, Kennedy's analysis relies on “a moral core” reminiscent of the penetrating—even if not then majority-forming—readings of the Eighth Amendment by Justices William J. Brennan and Thurgood Marshall.¹²⁰ The following analysis examines that core, focusing on how the decision: (1) frames the fundamental issue before the Court in moral terms; (2) emphasizes moral dimensions of Eighth Amendment doctrine; and (3) applies that jurisprudence in a manner that bespeaks the justices' own moral agency.¹²¹ To demonstrate how the text as a whole is an exercise in disputed, and disputable, judicial moral reasoning, the analysis discusses the dissent in tandem.

I. Kennedy's moral tone and context

A threshold textual analysis supports the premise that Kennedy is morally focused. The majority opinion employs formulations of the word “moral” eight times; the dissent does so eleven times.¹²² Those nineteen formulations of “moral”

¹¹⁷ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 440-41.

¹¹⁸ Id. at 413.

¹¹⁹ Id. at 438 (quoting Coker, 433 U.S. at 598 (plurality opinion)).

¹²⁰ See Semel, supra note 27, at 167 & nn.312, 315.

¹²¹ Corresponding to each focus area, subsection (1) treats Part I of Kennedy, especially 554 U.S. at 413, 418, subsection (2) treats Part II of Kennedy, id. at 419-21, and subsection (3) treats Parts III-V of Kennedy, id. at 422-47.

¹²² Compare Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 418, 419, 427, 435, 437, 438 (twice), 443, with id. (Alito, J., dissenting) at 452, 459, 461, 466 (four times), 467 (twice), 469 (twice).

represent an approximate 70% appearance rate compared with iterations of the conceptually analogous “evolving standards of decency,” which appear fifteen times in the majority opinion and twelve times in the dissent.¹²³ By way of comparison, references to proportionality and formulations thereof, which forms the substantive core of Eighth Amendment analysis, occur nineteen times (sixteen times in the majority opinion, three times in the dissent)—i.e., just as frequently as formulations of “moral.”¹²⁴ How, though, does this get fleshed out?

The majority opinion sets a moral tone early on, proceeding from a brief summary of its holding to aver that the petitioner’s brutal rape of his eight-year-old stepdaughter “cannot be recounted ... in a way sufficient to capture in full the hurt and horror inflicted on his victim or to convey the revulsion society, and the jury that represents it, sought to express by sentencing [him] to death.”¹²⁵ Following a gruesome recitation of facts that would arouse moral indignation in any decent person,¹²⁶ it shifts to an ethical assessment of those details’ legal significance, characterizing the judgment rendered by the Louisiana court being reviewed as having “reasoned[that] the rape of a child is unique in terms of the harm it inflicts upon the victim and our society.”¹²⁷ Kennedy’s own reasoning is “moral,” then, in a first sense, to the extent that the Court contextualizes the case as turning on a ¹²³ Compare id. (majority opinion) at 419 (four times), 420, 421, 434, 435 (twice), 438, 439, 441, 446 (twice), 447, with id. (Alito, J., dissenting) at 447, 448 (three times), 452, 454, 455, 458, 459, 460 (twice), 467. This analysis includes variations of “values” as a general synonym for “standards” (of decency), but does not include equivocal uses of the word “standard” in the sense more typical of legal writing, e.g., “standards that would guide a [death penalty case] decisionmaker so the penalty is ... not imposed in an arbitrary way,” id. at 439.

¹²⁴ Compare id. (majority opinion) at 419, 420, 421, 424 (twice), 426, 427 (twice), 428, 429, 430 (twice), 435, 438, 441, 446, with id. (Alito, J., dissenting) at 449, 450, 453. While references to “the Eighth Amendment” appear twenty-five times in the majority opinion, twenty-two times in the dissent. Compare id. (majority opinion) at 412 (twice), 413, 418, 419 (six times), 420 (twice), 421 (twice), 424, 426 (twice), 427, 428, 434 (three times), 435, 437, 446, with id. (Alito, J., dissenting) at 447, 448 (three times), 449 (twice), 450, 451 n.1, 452, 454, 461 (twice), 462, 464 (twice), 465 (twice), 466, 467, 469 (three times). But many such references exist for citation purposes, multiple appearances within the course of several sentences, not to mention in formal citations per se, supporting this premise. Thus, that variations on “moral,” which is a distinctive substantive theme, occur approximately 40% as frequently as often-boilerplate recitations of the constitutional provision applicable to the case seems not insignificant.

¹²⁵ Id. at 413

¹²⁶ See id. at 413-15.

¹²⁷ Id. at 418 (citing State v. Kennedy, 957 So. 2d 757, 781 (La. 2007) (Kennedy I)).

proportional assessment of “unique” forms of harm extending to child rape victims and those charged with protecting them.¹²⁸ Assessing harm as a basis for judging the proportionality—and thus constitutionality—of a particular punishment ipso facto implies moral reasoning. Moreover, this “common good” dimension to the Court’s framing of the issue recalls moral dimensions of death penalty discourse described in Part I, and resonates with the Catholic perspective, as Part III asserts.

The dissent also begins with a moral tone, but with different effect, objecting to the majority’s “sweeping” and “[un]sound” holding no matter how young the child, no matter how many times the child is raped, no matter how many children the perpetrator rapes, no matter how sadistic the crime, no matter how much physical or psychological trauma is inflicted, and no matter how heinous the perpetrator’s prior criminal record may be.¹²⁹

The dissent underscores the “grievous[]” harm not just to “any victim” of rape—especially children—but to “society[] ... as well,” given pernicious long-term effects such as “substance abuse, dangerous sexual behaviors[,] ... inability to relate to others on an interpersonal level, and psychiatric illness.”¹³⁰ It continues:

The harm that is caused to the victims and to society at large by the worst child rapists is grave. It is the judgment of the Louisiana lawmakers and those in an increasing number of other States that these harms justify the death penalty. The Court provides no cogent explanation why this legislative judgment should be overridden. Conclusory references to “decency,” “moderation,” “restraint,” “full progress,” and “moral judgment” are not enough. . . . [T]he worst child rapists exhibit the epitome of moral depravity[,] and . . . child rape inflicts grievous injury on victims and on society in general.¹³¹

¹²⁸ See note 6, supra (citing various definitions of “moral” as, e.g., the “expressi[o]n[of] ... a conception of right behavior,” as well as that which is “operative on one’s conscience or ethical judgment,” or broadly pertains to the “perceptual or psychological”). Specifically, the majority ascribes to Kennedy I, 957 So. 2d at 781, the proposition that “[b]ecause children are a class that need special protection,” the harm that child rape inflicts “upon [both] the victim and our society” is “unique,” such that precedent precluding the death penalty for the rape of an adult woman should not necessarily preclude it for child rape. Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 418 (quotation omitted; emphasis added).

¹²⁹ Id. at 447 (Alito, J., dissenting).

¹³⁰ Id. at 468-69 (Alito, J., dissenting).

¹³¹ Id. at 469 (Alito, J., dissenting).

Both opinions' juxtaposition of tone and context introduces a critical dimension of reading Kennedy as a text of judicial moral reasoning. The Court is unified in affirming the case's moral salience; both opinions allude to if not display "moral outrage" and "capital emotions," to use phrases scholars have employed to address capital child rape statutes.¹³² But the Court sharply divides as to how that salience should be addressed. This Article argues that what the Court does in Kennedy—or in some respects fails to do—turns on moral intuitionism versus moral reasoning. That is, how ought jurisprudence that necessarily embodies moral judgment translate moral intuitions, as exhibited in the texts cited above, into moral reasoning proper to jurisprudence per se? That the dissent argues that putatively "conclusory" moral judgment is insufficient for the Court's decision, even as it inveighs against insufficient accounting for child rape's moral depravity, underscores that its signatories do see the issue as a moral one, but disagree as to the locus of authority in resolving it.¹³³ The crucial question for the Court, relevant to larger death penalty discourse, is not whether moral judgment is the heart of the matter, but rather who the authoritative moral judge is, and what sources should guide that moral reasoning. Kennedy's summary of Eighth Amendment doctrine underscores this point, but leaves fiercely contested how to resolve it.

2. Moral reasoning and Eighth Amendment doctrine

As a threshold matter, "the Eighth Amendment's protection against excessive or cruel and unusual punishments flows from the basic 'precept of justice that punishment for [a] crime should be graduated and proportioned to [the] offense.'" ¹³⁴ Proportionality analysis requires, at bottom, an exercise of moral reasoning.¹³⁵ For, the majority continues, "whether th[e] Constitution's]

¹³² Professor Susan Bandes has argued that Kennedy raises larger questions about our society's use of the criminal law to both reflect and implement moral outrage over horrific crimes. Susan A. Bandes, Child Rape, Moral Outrage, and the Death Penalty, 103 NW. U. L. REV. COLLOQUY 17 (2008). See also Douglas A. Berman & Stephanos Bibas, Engaging Capital Emotions, 102 NW. U. L. REV. COLLOQUY 355, 355-56 (arguing that capital punishment is not inappropriate for child rape, and that emotions "help[] to explain many features of capital-punishment jurisprudence ... [because they] reflect the public's moral perspective that certain crimes have profound emotional resonance." (citations omitted)).

¹³³ See notes 129-31 infra, and accompanying text.

¹³⁴ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419 (quoting Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 367 (1910)).

¹³⁵ See discussion of Professor Moore's treatment of Eighth Amendment moral reasoning, supra notes 23-26 and accompanying text. See also Stinneford, supra note 17, at 961-62 (arguing that proportionality ultimately turns on a conception of retributive justice involving normative rather than utilitarian judgments).

proportionality requirement has been fulfilled” turns on “norms that ‘currently prevail,’”¹³⁶ with the “Amendment ‘draw[ing] its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society.’”¹³⁷ Given this “whether” formulation, the Court’s analysis is, first, descriptive: does a punishment, assertedly proportionate to an offense, cohere with broad social mores?¹³⁸ Professor Michael Moore names this “a third-person judgment” as it concerns “what some other group ... believes is morally right.”¹³⁹

This is not the whole matter, though, implicating the above-noted problem concerning moral authority and moral reasoning sources. Proportionality analysis turns on two considerations, which might be framed as the Court’s obligation to consult and then render moral judgments: (1) it must examine “‘objective indicia of society’s standards, as expressed in legislative enactments and state practice’”¹⁴⁰ (hereinafter, “objective indicia analysis”); and (2) it must apply “standards elaborated by controlling precedents and by the Court’s own understanding and interpretation of the Eighth Amendment’s text, history, meaning, and purpose”¹⁴¹ (hereinafter, “independent judgment analysis”). The precise wording of the latter is unique to Kennedy—or was at the time.¹⁴² But both evoke Professor Berman’s “integrative jurisprudence,” which emphasizes that law must be believable if it is to be administrable, and that this translation involves “reason[,] ... will[,] ... emotion, intuition, and faith.”¹⁴³

¹³⁶ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419 (quoting Atkins, 536 U.S. at 311) (emphasis added).

¹³⁷ Id. (quoting Trop, 356 U.S. at 101 (plurality opinion)) (brackets omitted).

¹³⁸ Kennedy’s application of the two-prong test represents the critical rupture between the majority and the dissent, as discussed in subsection (c) below.

¹³⁹ Moore, supra note 17, at 53 (emphasis added).

¹⁴⁰ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 421 (quoting Simmons, 543 U.S. at 563; citing Enmund, 458 U.S. at 788; Coker, 443 U.S. at 593-97 (plurality opinion)).

¹⁴¹ Id. (citing Enmund, 458 U.S. at 797-801; Coker, 443 U.S. at 597-600 (plurality opinion); Gregg, 428 U.S. at 182-83 (joint op. of Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.)). The dissent characterizes much of this dimension of the Court’s analysis as “not pertinent to the Eighth Amendment question at hand.” Id. at 461 (Alito, J., dissenting).

¹⁴² The Court subsequently quoted this rendering of the independent judgment analysis in Graham v. Florida, 130 S. Ct. at 2022.

¹⁴³ BERMAN, supra note 59, at vii. (Presumably, Professor Berman means not religious faith per se, but affective-intellectual assent to deeply valued norms.)

Here Kennedy is significant. Because “[c]onsensus is not dispositive” (i.e., in the form of the objective indicia analysis),¹⁴⁴ justices must proceed from a descriptive, “what-is” account to an interpretive exercise of dynamic moral reasoning. Taken together, the two-pronged proportionality test is a hermeneutical exercise—hermeneutics itself a mode of analysis germane to the law, religion, and moral reasoning.¹⁴⁵ For moving from “what-is” to “what shall be”—the latter in the sense of setting forth a rule of law—itself “necessarily embodies a moral judgment.”¹⁴⁶ This is what Professor Moore calls “committed, first-person moral judgments,” which require grappling with “the nature of the rights protected by the Constitution.”¹⁴⁷ On one hand, this precludes judges from imposing simply personal preferences or subjective views—though that is what the dissenting justices conclude the majority ends up doing.¹⁴⁸ Yet it also requires, among other things, that they be “guided by [more than] the dry recitation of moral shibboleths accepted by others.”¹⁴⁹ On the assumption that “surely first, foremost, and always, ¹⁴⁴ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 421.

¹⁴⁵ Generally speaking, hermeneutics concerns the interpretation and understanding of texts. See generally Bjørn Ramberg and Kristin Gjesdal, Hermeneutics, THE STANFORD ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PHILOSOPHY (Edward N. Zalta ed., Summer 2009 ed.), <http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/sum2009/entries/hermeneutics/> (last visited Dec. 21, 2011). In line with characterizing Kennedy as a text of judicial moral reasoning that taps into integrative jurisprudence, hermeneutics theory assists this Article’s analysis inasmuch as it addresses interpretation in both theology and the law. Traditionally speaking, legal hermeneutics addressed “rules for filling in gaps in a codified law, and hence had a normative character.” Hans-Georg Gadamer, Hermeneutics and Historicism, Supplement I in TRUTH AND METHOD 505-41, 505 (Joel Weinsheimer & Donald G. Marshall trans., 2d rev. ed. 1999). This filling-in-of-gaps in a manner that has a distinctly normative character is what the Kennedy majority appears to be doing, and in this sense its project is both hermeneutical, and not inapposite the sort of enterprise that often occurs in theology, as Part III(C) will explore. See id. at 510 (observing that “we can see in the three fields in which hermeneutics has played a part from the beginning—in the historical and philological sciences, in theology, and in jurisprudence—that the critique of historical objectivism or ‘positivism’ has given new importance to the hermeneutical aspect.”). See also Francis J. Mootz, Faithful Hermeneutics, 2009 MICH. ST. L. REV. 361, 363 (2009) (describing the relevance of Professor Gadamer’s work to hermeneutical theory in both the law and in theology, emphasizing that “[l]aw and religion are activities” that involve “norm creation” that is “historically-unfolding”).

¹⁴⁶ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419 (quotation omitted).

¹⁴⁷ Moore, supra note 17, at 58, 62 (emphasis added).

¹⁴⁸ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 469 (Alito, J., dissenting).

¹⁴⁹ Moore, supra note 17, at 63.

the job of a judge is to judge,” Professor Moore speculated, before the Court decided Kennedy, that such judgments “might well ... be[] considerably more nuanced and responsive to the facts of [a] case,” with judges having to “throw[] off ... deference to the moral views of others.”¹⁵⁰ As further analysis argues, the Court did exactly that in Kennedy.¹⁵¹ That this sort of jurisprudence can have the “dynamic” effect of precipitating further development of the Court’s jurisprudence may well be confirmed by Justice Thomas’s post-Kennedy dissent in Graham, which in its critical characterization of Kennedy’s moral reach arguably confirms that Kennedy, perhaps more than any case before it, contextualizes proportionality analysis at bottom as a moral undertaking, requiring Eighth Amendment interpreters to approach their task as dynamic moral agents.¹⁵²

That the Court in Kennedy defined its task as dynamic moral agency is also seen in how it defines evolving standards of decency—which, as a metaphor, itself implies dynamic process. It is significant how much Kennedy turns on assertions and, per the dissent, counter-assertions concerning evolving standards of decency.¹⁵³ Moreover, the majority opinion’s textual structure subsumes reciting ¹⁵⁰ Id. at 65 (citation omitted).

¹⁵¹ See the discussion of Kennedy’s application of the governing rules in subsection (3), infra. Certainly the dissenting justices saw this as a case of “for worse,” as have critical commentators, including those who defend proportionality analysis generally. See, e.g., Stinneford, supra note 17, at 922-23 (characterizing Kennedy’s “fictionalized consensus ... to support its own judgment” as “disingenuous,” and its “obvious manipulation [of its analysis] to reach its desired conclusion” posing the risk of “undermin[ing] public respect for judicial review and for the law.”).

¹⁵² As Justice Thomas described Kennedy, and the Court’s reliance on it in Graham, [t]he Court ... openly claims the power not only to approve or disapprove of democratic choices in penal policy based on evidence of how society’s standards have evolved, but also on the basis of the Court’s independent perception of how those standards should evolve, which depends on what the Court concedes is necessarily ... a moral judgment regarding the propriety of a given punishment in today’s society. [But, t]he categorical proportionality review the Court employs in capital cases thus lacks a principled foundation. The Court’s decision ... is significant because it does not merely apply this standard—it remarkably expands its reach. For the first time in its history, the Court declares an entire class of offenders immune from a noncapital sentence using the categorical approach it previously reserved for death penalty cases alone. Graham, 130 S. Ct. at 2046 (Thomas, J., dissenting) (citing Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 419) (internal quotation marks and paragraph break omitted; first and second emphases in original, third and fourth emphases added).

¹⁵³ See note 123 (cataloguing the Kennedy opinions’ respective references to evolving standards of decency).

the purposes of punishment to a sweeping assertion of the evolving standards of decency, rooted in a substantive conception of human dignity:

Evolving standards of decency must embrace and express respect for the dignity of the person, and the punishment of criminals must conform to that rule. . . . As we shall discuss, punishment is justified under one or more of three principal rationales: rehabilitation, deterrence, and retribution. . . . It is the last of these, retribution, that most often can contradict the law's own ends. This is of particular concern when the Court interprets the meaning of the Eighth Amendment in capital cases. When the law punishes by death, it risks its own sudden descent into brutality, transgressing the constitutional commitment to decency and restraint.¹⁵⁴

Parts II(c) and IV will explore the implications of the Court's application of this human dignity precept. Here it suffices to observe that, whatever the majority's invocation of it is taken to mean substantively, human dignity is a prerequisite for weighing the traditional purposes of punishment. This fact, together with the fact that a substantive conception of human dignity resonates with broad and diverse traditions of moral reasoning—it echoes, that is, integrative jurisprudence¹⁵⁵—implies that, per Kennedy, not only judges but perhaps also legislators, in forming the criminal law, must take seriously the extent to which their moral enterprise reflects not simply on offenders' moral desert, but more broadly on how their punishment reflects on the law and on us as a society. This view echoes that component of contemporary Catholic teaching expressing concern for the death penalty's capacity to “diminish[] us all.”¹⁵⁶ It also echoes the moral reflections of those asserting that the ultimate punishment ultimately reflects as much on society as on the repugnance of those to whom it is meted out.¹⁵⁷

¹⁵⁴ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 420 (emphasis added) (citing Trop, 356 U.S. at 100 (plurality opinion); Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957, 999 (1991) (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment)). The opinion extensively discusses the purposes of punishment in the latter part of its analysis, id. at 441-47.

¹⁵⁵ See, e.g., THE CONCEPT OF HUMAN DIGNITY IN HUMAN RIGHTS DISCOURSE (David Kretzmer & Eckart Klein eds., 2002); Matthias Mahlmann, The Basic Law at 60: Human Dignity and the Culture of Republicanism, 11 GERMAN L.J. 9, 10 (2010) (asserting that “one should not overlook that human dignity has become quite generally a leading principle of the international human rights culture,” and citing a number of examples across international law and institutions).

¹⁵⁶ See note 43, supra.

¹⁵⁷ See notes 34-38, supra, and accompanying text.

What Kennedy leaves unclear is how that analysis gets carried out, by whom, and at what stage of judicial review. Along such lines, Professor John Stinneford critiques the Court's proportionality jurisprudence as "incoherent," as rooted in "an ever-shifting definition of excessiveness" and an "evolving standards of decency test [that] has proven itself an unreliable and ineffective measure of cruelty."¹⁵⁸ Arguing that the Court's approach is untethered to objective standards, he advocates, for such standard, "the size of the gap between prior punishment practice and the new punishment being challenged."¹⁵⁹ Even this test, however, he subjects to the proviso that a punishment significantly exceeding prior practice be justified on a retributive basis.¹⁶⁰ In the end, then, such a resolution merely returns the analysis to a moral core, the standard for which remains one of necessarily moral judgment.¹⁶¹

From its restatement of the evolving standards of decency principle, Kennedy's doctrinal summary next casts a related principle, that of narrowing, also in moral terms. Having asserted that evolving standards of decency, read in terms of human dignity, require substantive limits on punishment, Kennedy continues:

For these reasons we have explained that capital punishment must be limited to those offenders who commit a narrow category of the most serious crimes and whose extreme culpability makes them the most deserving of execution. Though the death penalty is not invariably unconstitutional, the Court insists upon confining the instances in which the punishment can be imposed.¹⁶²

¹⁵⁸ Stinneford, supra note 17, at 899, 968.

¹⁵⁹ Id. at 972.

¹⁶⁰ Id. at 968.

¹⁶¹ Professor Stinneford concedes that the test for cruelty does "involve[] an exercise of the Court's own judgment," arguing rather that this Court's exercise lacks "constitutional guideposts." See id. at 972. He seems to assume that the gap-measuring standard that he proposes will narrow the range of cases ultimately turning on a normative exercise, such that it will be in just a handful of cases that "[t]he Court should also ask whether some change in circumstances relevant to the offender's culpability justifies an increase in the harshness of punishment beyond what prior practice permitted." Id. While his proposed reform may narrow the scope of the problem that he identifies, it does not necessarily resolve the moral reasoning framework quandary—i.e., concerning sources and authority—that remains at the core of post-Kennedy proportionality analysis.

¹⁶² Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 420 (quotations omitted; emphasis added) (citing Simmons, 543 U.S. at 568; Atkins, 536 U.S. at 319; Gregg, 428 U.S. at 153).

Professor Steven F. Shatz cogently describes how the Court's narrowing principle in fact encompasses two distinct but complementary requirements: (1) a "genuine narrowing"

Kennedy thus characterizes proportionality generally and narrowing specifically—linchpins of death penalty jurisprudence—as moral exercises turning (1) on culpability and dessert, and (2) on an insistence on confining the death penalty’s scope.¹⁶³ The first necessarily pertains to an offender, while the second requires an exercise of authority premised on applying broad concepts—e.g., human dignity—rather than assessing particular cases. Both exercises, particularly the latter, implicate meta-judicial principles—i.e., broad normative or perspectival values that orient positive law.¹⁶⁴ Here, too, the Court as much implicates its own moral agency as exhibits concern for the moral implications of statutory frameworks entrusting factfinders with authority to assess offenders’ moral dessert. What still remains unclear is how to referee the interplay between social practices’ moral implications, and those practices’ arbiters’ own moral agency.

3. Moral reasoning and Eighth Amendment application

The force of Kennedy’s moral reasoning lens, and the majority’s and dissent’s disagreement over how to focus it, particularly emerges in the application principle” under Furman and Zant, by which states must use specific, statutory criteria to restrict the class of death-eligible offenders to those who have, per the state’s view, committed the most aggravated murders; (2) a “‘proportionality’ principle” under Enmund and Tison, by which states cannot apply the death penalty to a particular crime not deemed sufficiently aggravated by a national standard. “In combination, the principles require states to limit death-eligibility to defendants who commit a narrow category of the most serious crimes, the worst of the worst” Shatz, The Eighth Amendment, the Death Penalty, and Ordinary Robbery-Burglary Murderers: A California Case Study, 59 FLA. L. REV. 719, 722-23 (2007) (quotations and citations omitted).

¹⁶³ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 420-21 (tracing a thirty-plus-year history of decisions categorically proscribing the death penalty: for crimes carrying a mandatory death sentence (Woodson, 428 U.S. at 305 (plurality opinion); Roberts, 428 U.S. at 336 (plurality opinion)); for the rape, or kidnapping and rape, of an adult woman (Coker, 433 U.S. at 584; Eberheart v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 917 (1977)); for accomplice liability in felony-murder simpliciter (Enmund, 458 U.S. at 782 (but see Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137 (1987) (upholding the death penalty for accomplices in limited circumstances))); for persons with mental retardation (Atkins, 536 U.S. at 304); and for juvenile offenders (Simmons, 543 U.S. at 571)).

¹⁶⁴ See, e.g., Jaye Ellis, Review Essay, Overexploitation of a Valuable Resource? New Literature on the Precautionary Principle, 17 EUR. J. INT’L L. 445, 458 (2006) (“a meta-judicial principle . . . provides a conduit between legal and non-legal forms of normativity” (citation omitted)). Of course, a major dilemma in law is whether positivist formulations should rely on meta-judicial themes. See, e.g., Jost Delbrück, Exercising Public Authority Beyond the State: Transnational Democracy and/or Alternative Legitimation Strategies, 10 IND. J. GLOBAL LEGAL STUD. 29, 29 & n.3 (2003) (surveying legal positivism’s rejection of meta-judicial theories).

of the doctrine just summarized. Three major dimensions flesh out this argument: (a) Kennedy's blurring of the objective indicia and independent judgment analyses; (b) its elevation of human dignity as a moral reasoning value; and (c) its reprise of the purposes of punishment.

a) Moralizing the objective indicia analysis

The majority opinion sets forth a lengthy objective indicia analysis,¹⁶⁵ reviewing “the history of the death penalty for [child rape] and other nonhomicide crimes, current state statutes and new enactments, and the number of executions since 1964”—all to conclude that “there is a national consensus against capital punishment for the crime of child rape.”¹⁶⁶ But the most important kernel of its decision may lie in the fact that, at bottom, the decision turns on the majority's own moral agency.¹⁶⁷ Its objective indicia analysis has its own limitations,¹⁶⁸ plus there are those asserted by the dissent¹⁶⁹ and by critical scholarship.¹⁷⁰ But beyond ¹⁶⁵ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 422-34.

¹⁶⁶ Id. at 434.

¹⁶⁷ Compare id. at 434 (observing that, while “objective evidence of contemporary values as it relates to punishment for child rape is entitled to great weight, but it does not end [the Court's] inquiry”), with id. at (Alito, J., dissenting) (“The Court is willing to block the potential emergence of a national consensus in favor of permitting the death penalty for child rape because, in the end, what matters is the Court's ‘own judgment’ regarding ‘the acceptability of the death penalty.’” (quoting the majority opinion)).

¹⁶⁸ Following its decision in June 2008, the Court addressed the fact that its objective indicia analysis did not account for the fact, brought to its attention in a petition for rehearing, that the U.S. military had a statute permitting the death penalty for child rape. Kennedy v. Louisiana, 129 S. Ct. 1 (mem. op. Oct. 1, 2008) (observing, in a statement respecting the denial of rehearing, that while the Court had not addressed the military statute, that fact was insufficient for rehearing).

¹⁶⁹ In dissent, Justice Alito argued, inter alia: that the majority failed to establish a national consensus against the death penalty for child rape, and/or, that it insufficiently acknowledged factors other than evolving standards of decency—e.g., interpretations of the reach of the Court's holding in Coker, barring capital punishment for the rape of an adult woman—to explain why more states did not have capital child rape statutes; that it was logically faulty to characterize a would-be decision to uphold extant capital child rape statutes as an “extension” of the death penalty; and that the Court's own precedents did not require reading the Eighth Amendment as a unidirectional “ratchet” that interprets a perhaps temporary leniency consensus as the basis for imposing a constitutional rule. See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 448-65 (Alito, J., dissenting). On this last point, the dissent identified as a central fault the majority's resort to its own judgment in such a way as to leave the evolving standards of decency principle essentially unprincipled: “In terms of the Court's metaphor of moral evolution, [legislative] enactments might have turned out to be an evolutionary dead end. But they might also have been the beginning of a strong new that, the Court itself does little to clarify the relationship between the objective indicia and independent judgment analyses, essentially moralizing the former.

After surveying national trends of capital punishment for child rape and comparing that assessment with the Court's earlier treatment of the death penalty for juveniles, vicarious felony murderers, and defendants with mental retardation,¹⁷¹ the Court takes up a lengthy analysis of Coker, which precluded capital punishment for adult rape and, in doing so, reflected on differences between rape and murder.¹⁷² Acknowledging that Coker, which yielded a plurality opinion, left questions about this distinction's reach "susceptible" of debate,¹⁷³ Kennedy characterized Coker's reading of national consensus as being "confirmed [by]" its—i.e., Coker's—own "independent judgment" that, while "[r]ape is without doubt deserving of serious punishment[,] ... in terms of moral depravity and of the injury to the person and to the public, it does not compare with murder."¹⁷⁴ It thus arguably identified a basis in precedent for trumping, via its own moral judgment, any remaining ambiguities that might emerge from—or, per the dissent, be read into—the objective indicia analysis.¹⁷⁵ This further supports the inference that the Court views the ultimate analysis as a normative one.¹⁷⁶ evolutionary line. We will never know, because the Court today snuffs out the line in its incipient stage." Id. at 461 (Alito, J., dissenting). Justice Thomas's dissent in Graham offers a parallel critique. See note 22, supra, and accompanying text.

¹⁷⁰ Professor Stinneford, for example, has argued that the Kennedy majority "c[a]me up with a fictionalized consensus against the punishment to support its own judgment," and that this critical failure matches the "implausib[ility]" of the Court's societal consensus findings, as well, in Simmons before it and in Graham after it. Stinneford, supra note 17, at 922, 973.

¹⁷¹ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 425-26 (citing cases).

¹⁷² Id. at 426-31 (discussing Coker, 433 U.S. at 592-600 (plurality opinion)).

¹⁷³ Id. at 428.

¹⁷⁴ Id. at 427-28 (emphasis added) (quoting Coker, 433 U.S. at 593 (plurality opinion)); see also Coker, 433 U.S. at 597 (plurality opinion) (observing that "evidenc[e] of] the attitude of state legislatures and sentencing juries do not wholly determine th[e] controversy[before the Court], for the Constitution contemplates that in the end our own judgment will be brought to bear on the question of the acceptability of the death penalty under the Eighth Amendment.").

¹⁷⁵ Objecting to the majority's analysis of Coker, Justice Alito argued that "dicta in th[e] Court's decision in Coker ... stunted legislative consideration of the question whether the death penalty for the targeted offense of raping a young child is consistent with the prevailing standards of decency," further observing, as relevant to assessing evidence of the evolving standards of decency, that "conscientious state lawmakers, whatever their personal views about the morality of imposing the death penalty for child rape, may defer to this Court's dicta, either because they respect our authority and expertise in interpreting the Constitution or merely because they do not relish the prospect of being held to have violated the Constitution and contravened prevailing 'standards of decency.'" Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 448, 452 (Alito, J., dissenting).

But the Court's conceptual move underscores rather than resolves the fundamental question about moral authority, its sources, and their alignment within Eighth Amendment jurisprudence. By invoking Coker's "confirmation" language, one reasonably could ask whether the objective indicia analysis is meant to involve simple jurisdiction counting, which the Court ballpark-measures (i.e., "confirms") via the yardstick of its own judgment. Or, could it mean examining with greater scrutiny on what moral reasoning basis there might be movement in one direction or another? The dissent alludes to the potential moral salience—not to mention potentially dispositive value—of such movements,¹⁷⁷ but does not further clarify how, when, or even whether they should figure into the calculus of the Court's own judgment. It is one thing to critique the weight that the majority gives to its own judgment and its reasoning.¹⁷⁸ But short of mustering a majority to overturn the two-prong analysis altogether, the dissent's critique throws stones at a glass house rather than offer a coherent alternative for assessing the relevance of objective indices' own moral salience to independent judgment analysis.

¹⁷⁶ This is confirmed—by way of objection—by the dissent, which argues that while six new state laws [targeting child rape might not] necessarily establish a "national consensus" or even ... [serve as] sure evidence of an ineluctable trend[, i]n terms of the Court's metaphor of moral evolution, these enactments might have turned out to be an evolutionary dead end[or] ... the beginning of a strong new evolutionary line. We will never know, because the Court today snuffs out the line in its incipient stage. Id. at 461 (Alito, J., dissenting).

¹⁷⁷ See note 169.

¹⁷⁸ See note 169; see also Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 462 (Alito, J., dissenting) (arguing that "[t]he Eighth Amendment protects the right of an accused. It does not authorize this Court to strike down federal or state criminal laws on the ground that they are not in the best interests of crime victims or the broader society. The Court's policy arguments concern matters that legislators should—and presumably do—take into account in deciding whether to enact a capital child-rape statute, but these arguments are irrelevant to the question that is before us in this case. Our cases have cautioned against using the aegis of the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause to cut off the normal democratic processes, but the Court forgets that warning here." (internal quotation marks and citations omitted; citing Atkins, 536 U.S. at 323 (Rehnquist, C. J., dissenting); Gregg, 428 U.S. at 176, (joint opinion of Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.)).

For example, should courts somehow determine whether pro-death penalty movement is a function of temporary “moral panic”—i.e., moral intuitionism alone—rather than of a deliberative social judgment, expressed through legislation, that a particular crime implicates such profound culpability and has such insidious effects as to merit the ultimate punishment?¹⁷⁹ Perhaps a finding of the former would justify placing a thumb on the independent judgment scale, while a finding of the latter should preclude it. Were the Court to clarify that a jurisprudence that necessarily embodies moral judgment requires a kind of scrutiny (e.g., akin to rational basis—or even strict—scrutiny, but specified as moral reasoning), it might develop a test worthy of integrative jurisprudence, and more likely to yield greater than five-to-four majorities. But, were such a test to be developed, what substantive norm might guide it? Could human dignity qualify?

b) Human dignity as a moral reasoning value

Introducing its independent judgment analysis by invoking precedent,¹⁸⁰ Kennedy proceeds to explore moral dimensions of the victim’s dignity:

It must be acknowledged that there are moral grounds to question a rule barring capital punishment for a crime against an individual that did not result in death. These facts illustrate the point. Here the victim’s fright, the sense of betrayal, and the nature of her injuries caused more prolonged physical and mental suffering than, say, a sudden killing by an unseen assassin. The attack was not just on her but on her childhood. For this reason, we should be most reluctant to rely upon the language of the plurality in Coker, which posited that, for the victim of rape, “life may not be nearly so happy as it was,” but it is not beyond repair. Rape has a permanent psychological, emotional, and sometimes physical impact on the child. We cannot dismiss the ¹⁷⁹ As Professor John Stinneford has argued, [t]he Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause ... does not focus on punishments that are “cruel and rare” but on those that are “cruel and new.” This focus on new punishments implies that the core purpose of the Clause is to protect criminal offenders when the government’s desire to inflict pain has become temporarily and unjustly enflamed, whether this desire is caused by political or racial animus or moral panic in the face of a perceived crisis. In these situations, the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause is supposed to serve as a check on the impulse to ratchet up punishments to an unprecedented degree of harshness. Stinneford, supra note 17, at 907.

¹⁸⁰ Id. at 434 (citing Coker, 433 U.S. at 597 (plurality opinion), as well as Simmons, 543 U.S. at 563, and Enmund, 458 U.S. at 797).

years of long anguish that must be endured by the victim of child rape.¹⁸¹

Here the majority affirms the moral valence of insights that stem from the task of assessing criminal acts—a task that, per the dissent, must remain within the ambit of democratic rather than judicial process.¹⁸²

Either approach, though, appropriately characterizes the death penalty as a form of moral expression, acknowledging that the impetus to inflict it stems from some sense of redressing a grossly damaged moral order. Consistent, moreover, with the thesis that Kennedy portrays dynamic moral reasoning, the majority follows this statement affirming moral intuitions (i.e., broad, and legitimate, emotions and sensibilities about the repugnance of child rape and the long-term harm it causes), with a reaffirmation that the moral reasoning framework of the Court's jurisprudence (i.e., the rule of law), must guide the justices' own moral reflection. For the Court emphatically declares that “[i]t does not follow”—i.e., presumably, from moral intuitions alone, no matter how powerful—“that capital punishment is a proportionate penalty for [child rape].”¹⁸³ Rather,

[t]he constitutional prohibition against excessive or cruel and unusual punishments mandates that the State's power to punish “be exercised within the limits of civilized standards.” Evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society counsel us to be most hesitant before interpreting the Eighth Amendment to allow the extension of the death penalty, a hesitation that has special force where no life was taken in the commission of the crime. It is an established principle that decency, in its essence, presumes respect for the individual and thus moderation or restraint in the application of capital punishment.¹⁸⁴

Here some foundational sense of the offender's human dignity is presented almost as an a priori break on permitting capital punishment, irrespective of the moral repugnance of the crime or of society's desire to validate or recover the dignity of one who has grievously suffered it. And yet, again, we return to a question of authority and standards: what kind of standard—whether constitutional, or moral/ethical—guides the human dignity analysis, whether in this ¹⁸¹ Id. at 435 (internal citations omitted).

¹⁸² See note 169.

¹⁸³ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 435 (emphasis added).

¹⁸⁴ Id. (quoting Trop, 356 U.S. at 99, 100 (plurality opinion)) (internal citations omitted).

case or others? Here Kennedy is woefully opaque. To be sure, deciding a case, at least in part, on premises concerning human dignity was not novel to Kennedy. Towards the conclusion of his opinion for the majority in Simmons (an important Kennedy precursor), Justice Kennedy described the Constitution as “set[ting] forth, and rest[ing] upon, . . . broad provisions to secure individual freedom and preserve human dignity.”¹⁸⁵ Moreover, as Kennedy develops its independent judgment analysis, it returns to the evolving standards of decency (which might be viewed as a proxy of sorts for dignity), pointing to values enshrined in the Court’s jurisprudence that embrace consistency and predictability in the execution of capital judgments, and the due consideration of individual offenders’ character and the circumstances of their offense.¹⁸⁶

But Kennedy does not say how these considerations, typically associated with the moral analysis entrusted to sentencing bodies per the Woodson-Lockett line of cases, flesh out some conception of human dignity relevant to independent judgment analysis.¹⁸⁷ Perhaps the Court wants to balance punishment’s expressive ¹⁸⁵ Simmons, 543 U.S. at 578. See also, e.g., Maxine D. Goodman, Human Dignity in Supreme Court Constitutional Jurisprudence, 84 NEB. L. REV. 740 (2006). With particular attention to Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003) (overturning state laws criminalizing adult, same-sex, consensual sodomy), which included multiple references to human dignity—and also was a Justice Kennedy opinion—Professor Goodman has studied the Court’s deployment of human dignity as a substantive constitutional principle, which she defines as “a moral status affording individuals rights and standing against state action that demeans, offends, or humiliates.” Id. at 789. She also notes, however, that its decisions have not provided a clear “means of consistently applying human dignity as an underlying value.” Id. at 744. Notably, Professor Sheldon Lyke has argued that Lawrence “was decided in the shadow of the Eighth Amendment[, with] . . . changes in the Justices’ views toward crime, punishment, and decency . . . of great significance to the majority opinion.” Sheldon Bernard Lyke, Lawrence as an Eighth Amendment Case: Sodomy and the Evolving Standards of Decency, 15 WM. & MARY J. WOMEN & L. 633, 644 (2009).

¹⁸⁶ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 435-36 (citing California v. Brown, 479 U.S. 538, 541 (1987) (death penalty statutes must avoid arbitrariness and unpredictability); Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420, 428 (1980) (plurality opinion) (states must narrowly and precisely define aggravating factors used to determine if death is warranted); Lockett, 438 U.S. at 604-05 (plurality opinion) (factfinders must assess character and record of individual offender and circumstances of offense); Woodson, 428 U.S. at 304 (plurality opinion) (same)).

¹⁸⁷ See Woodson, 428 U.S. at 303-04 (plurality opinion) (describing as “[a] . . . constitutional shortcoming,” a “statute[’s] . . . failure to allow the particularized consideration of relevant aspects of the character and record of each convicted defendant before the imposition upon him of a sentence of death. . . . A process that accords no significance to relevant facets of the character and record of the individual offender or the circumstances of the particular offense excludes from consideration in fixing the ultimate punishment of death the possibility of compassionate or mitigating factors stemming from the diverse frailties of humankind. It treats all persons convicted of a designated offense

justice vis-à-vis a crime victim's human dignity, on one hand, and an offender's human dignity, on the other. For example, does elevating a human dignity precept mean that (1) absent a moral reasoning calculus that (a) considers an offender's dignity as presumptive fact and then (b) assesses its relevance to the proportionality of punishment decreed for the crime, then (2) otherwise-legitimate moral intuitions about an offender's desert of said punishment (e.g., as the dissent alludes¹⁸⁸) are constitutionally deficient? If so, it does not say so. Rather, the majority blandly acknowledges that enshrining such values into applicable rules of law yields "tension between general rules and case-specific circumstances [that] ha[ve] produced results not altogether satisfactory."¹⁸⁹ It then further dodges the issue by advertent to, without engaging, some justices' call to "cease efforts to resolve the tension and simply allow legislatures, prosecutors, courts, and juries greater latitude."¹⁹⁰ For a jurisprudence that necessarily embodies moral judgment, neither the Kennedy majority's conceptual framing of the basis for applying its independent judgment, nor dissenting justices' apparent preference for wholesale majoritarian deference, which merely begs the perennial question concerning the basis for and proper scope of judicial review, provide clear direction.

In a sense, here we observe the justices struggling—as most thoughtful persons presumably do—with their own moral agency, and with identifying which sources are appropriate and/or relevant to implementing it. Perhaps only history, only the slow development of jurisprudence itself—a theme addressed in Part IV—can begin to resolve lacunae such as these. Or maybe imprecision itself, judicial and moral, together with historical experience, point the way. It seems to have for Justice Stevens in Baze, and other justices in earlier cases, who concluded that "the failure to limit these same imprecisions by stricter enforcement of narrowing rules has raised doubts concerning the constitutionality of capital punishment itself."¹⁹¹ not as uniquely individual human beings, but as members of a faceless, undifferentiated mass to be subjected to the blind infliction of the penalty of death." (emphasis added)).

¹⁸⁸ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 447 (Alito, J., dissenting) (alluding to the relevance to punishment of, e.g., particularly sadistic crimes or an offender's heinous criminal record).

¹⁸⁹ Id. (citing cases).

¹⁹⁰ Id. at 436-37 (citing, e.g., Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639, 667-73 (1990) (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (arguing that the Woodson-Lockett rule requiring consideration of case- and offender-specific circumstances should be abandoned).

¹⁹¹ Id. at 437 (citing, Baze, 553 U.S. at 82-86 (Stevens, J., concurring in judgment). In Baze, Justice Stevens quoted Furman, 408 U.S. at 312 (White, J., concurring), for the proposition "that the imposition of the death penalty represents the pointless and needless extinction of life with only marginal contributions to any discernible social or public

In any event, the result of Kennedy's moral reasoning analysis is a kind of emperor-has-no-clothes peek at the justices as dynamic moral agents who remain "in search of a unifying principle"¹⁹² to ensure that their moral reasoning remains judicial moral reasoning, rather than moral reasoning—much less, moral intuitionism—by people who happen to be justices. Premised on an analogized "moral distinction between a murderer and a robber,"¹⁹³ Kennedy used the case of an eight-year-old's brutal rape at the hands of her stepfather to set forth a bright-line rule distinguishing murder from all crimes against individuals that do not lead to a victim's death.¹⁹⁴ Although this move may offer a unifying principle simply by virtue of presenting a clear rule—and thus represents an appropriate exercise of the Court's judicial authority—both the vehemence of the dissent, not to mention critical commentary on the decision after the fact,¹⁹⁵ made it clear that invoking human dignity did not necessarily buttress the majority's moral authority. Are there, then, any utilitarian or other reasoned grounds for the Court's approach?

purposes. A penalty with such negligible returns to the State is patently excessive and cruel and unusual punishment violative of the Eighth Amendment." Baze, 553 U.S. at 86 (Stevens, J., concurring in judgment) (quotation and brackets omitted). Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 437, also cites Furman, 408 U.S. at 310-14 (White, J., concurring), and Callins v. Collins, 510 U.S. 1141, 1144-1145 (1994) (Blackmun, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari), as in line with Justice Stevens's view in Baze.

¹⁹² Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 437. See also id. at 440-41 (observing that the Court "ha[s] spent more than 32 years articulating limiting factors that channel the jury's discretion to avoid the death penalty's arbitrary imposition in the case of capital murder. Though that practice remains sound, beginning the same process for crimes for which no one has been executed in more than 40 years would require experimentation in an area where a failed experiment would result in the execution of individuals undeserving of the death penalty. Evolving standards of decency are difficult to reconcile with a regime that seeks to expand the death penalty to an area where standards to confine its use are indefinite and obscure.").

¹⁹³ Id. at 438 (internal quotation marks omitted; citing Enmund, 458 U.S. at 797).

¹⁹⁴ See id. at 438 ("Consistent with evolving standards of decency and the teachings of our precedents we conclude that, in determining whether the death penalty is excessive, there is a distinction between intentional first-degree murder on the one hand and nonhomicide crimes against individual persons, even including child rape, on the other. The latter crimes may be devastating in their harm, as here, but in terms of moral depravity and of the injury to the person and to the public, they cannot be compared to murder in their "severity and irrevocability." (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

¹⁹⁵ Both candidates for president at the time, then-Senator Barack Obama and Senator John McCain, criticized Kennedy. Linda Greenhouse, Justices Bar Death Penalty For the Rape of a Child, N.Y. Times, June 26, 2008, available at <http://query.nytimes.com/gst/fullpage.html?res=950DE2D81239F935A15755C0A96E9C8B63&scp=2&sq=Obama+McCain+Kennedy+v.+Louisiana&st=nyt> (last visited Jan. 22, 2012).

c) Reprise of punishment's purposes

Following from its rule distinguishing between homicide and nonhomicide crimes, Kennedy observes that its “decision is consistent with the justifications offered for the death penalty,” which is “excessive” when “grossly out of proportion to the crime or ... [when it fails to] fulfill the two distinct social purposes served by the death penalty: retribution and deterrence of capital crimes.”¹⁹⁶ After briefly conceding—but with little elaboration on the significance of the fact—that “it cannot be said with any certainty that the death penalty for child rape serves no deterrent or retributive function,”¹⁹⁷ the majority offers a lengthy assessment of retribution. From the first premise that retribution “reflects society’s and the victim’s interests in seeing that the offender is repaid for the hurt he caused,” it concludes that retribution “does not justify the harshness of the death penalty” for child rape, reaffirming its insisted distinction between homicide and nonhomicide crimes, not to mention its moral reasoning premises.¹⁹⁸

Returning to an earlier theme, Kennedy observes that retribution extends from the one being punished to his punishers; it reflects on society, in the sense of implicating the fundamental moral question of “whether capital punishment ‘has the potential ... to allow the community as a whole, including the surviving family and friends of the victim, to affirm its own judgment that the culpability of the prisoner is so serious that the ultimate penalty must be sought and imposed.’”¹⁹⁹ Of course, this merely begs a moral question, and in so setting up that question—i.e., “when does a non-killing justify a killing”—Kennedy implicitly invokes the lex talionis. Regrettably, though, it says no more about what that invocation means, or should mean, vis-à-vis the purposes of punishment as understood or as expressed in contemporary mores. For a jurisprudence that necessarily embodies moral judgment, this is too large a question to simply leave on the table.

¹⁹⁶ Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 441 (emphasis added) (citing Coker, 433 U.S. at 592 (plurality opinion); Gregg, 428 U.S. at 173, 183, 187 (joint opinion of Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.)). This is a somewhat curious framing of Eighth Amendment analysis—i.e., vis-à-vis its juxtaposition of and proportionality and the various theories of punishment, as Professor Stinneford has argued, supra note 17, at 904-905, 908, 914-17, 961-78.

¹⁹⁷ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 441.

¹⁹⁸ Id. at 442 (citing Atkins, 536 U.S. at 319; Coker, 433 U.S. at 597-98 (plurality opinion); Furman, 408 U.S. at 308 (Stewart, J., concurring)).

¹⁹⁹ Id. at 442 (emphasis added) (quoting Panetti v. Quarterman, 551 U.S. 930, 958 (2007)).

Unsurprisingly, the dissent echoes the majority's affirmation of society's interest in expressing moral outrage at the crime of child rape, but rejects its subsequent conclusion that "[i]t is not at all evident that the child rape victim's hurt is lessened when the law permits the death of the perpetrator."²⁰⁰ Setting aside a lacuna in the dissent's reasoning—i.e., how that would or would not be evident, not to mention how such evidence would be susceptible of an administrable rule—it is notable that the majority argues that "[s]ociety's desire to inflict the death penalty for child rape by enlisting the child victim to assist it over the course of years in asking for capital punishment" itself "forces a moral choice on the child, who is not of mature age to make that choice."²⁰¹ Presumably it sees such a prospect's moral murkiness as grounds for a categorical rule. But does that view flow from moral reasoning, or does it merely express judicial moral fiat? As the dissent trenchantly observes, the majority is content for judicial moral reasoning to remain in search of a unifying principle, but is less content to allow the same for other moral actors—i.e., legislators, and the public whom they represent.²⁰²

The majority is not unaware of this criticism. In a coda to its expansive reasoning, the majority acknowledges that whether the Court has overstepped its authority is a legitimate question. That is, will its "institutional position and its holding ... have the effect of blocking further or later consensus in favor of the [death] penalty[?]"²⁰³ Has it impermissibly cast the evolving standards of decency as "a one-way ratchet[?]"²⁰⁴ Has the Court "ma[d]e it more difficult for consensus to change or emerge[, by] ... itself becom[ing] enmeshed in the process, part judge ²⁰⁰ Id. at 442. Cf. id. at 461-62 (Alito, J., dissenting) (critiquing the majority for being "willing to block the potential emergence of a national consensus in favor of permitting the death penalty for child rape," for "striking down federal or state criminal laws on the ground that they are not in the best interests of crime victims or the broader society," and for ignoring the precedents' "caution[] against using the aegis of the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause to cut off the normal democratic processes." (quotations omitted)).

²⁰¹ Id. at 443 (emphasis added).

²⁰² Id. at 461-62 (Alito, J., dissenting) (developing this critique).

²⁰³ Id. at 446.

²⁰⁴ Id. at 469 (Alito, J., dissenting); see also id. at 466 (Alito, J., dissenting) (observing that "[t]he Court has previously made it clear that '[t]he Eighth Amendment is not a ratchet, whereby a temporary consensus on leniency for a particular crime fixes a permanent constitutional maximum, disabling the States from giving effect to altered beliefs and responding to changed social conditions.'" (quoting Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957, 990 (1991) (principal opinion))).

and part the maker of that which it judges[?]²⁰⁵ In the end, Kennedy elides the dissent's criticism—and its resounding “yes!” to these questions. In doing so, however, it does provide a basis for ongoing death penalty discourse.

First, the majority neither confirms nor denies that it is setting forth a one-way ratchet. It concludes somewhat cryptically: “Difficulties in administering the [death] penalty to ensure against its arbitrary and capricious application require adherence to a rule reserving its use, at this stage of evolving standards and in cases of crimes against individuals, for crimes that take the life of the victim.”²⁰⁶ Does this leave the door open for a state to re-enact a capital child rape statute, after extensively documenting shifts in national consensus favoring such a law, on the assumption that, once imposed and challenged, a majority might be persuaded that, at that new “stage of evolving standards,” a carefully morally reasoned and sufficiently tailored statute might be upheld notwithstanding Kennedy? Probably not, given the clear statements elsewhere in the opinion distinguishing between homicide and nonhomicide crimes. But it is interesting to ask whether the majority meant to end on an open-ended note, or simply ran out of gas.

Second, the majority does rather magisterially set forth the “principle that use of the death penalty be restrained,” in keeping with “[t]he rule of evolving standards of decency with specific marks on the way to full progress and mature judgment . . .” Part of such progress and maturity, it would seem, consists of a sense of “justice [that] . . . preserv[es] the possibility that [a perpetrator] and the system will find ways to allow him to understand the enormity of his offense.” Arguably, then, the Kennedy majority holds out, even if it does not further explicate, hope in the merits of rehabilitation as one of criminal punishment's purposes.²⁰⁷ In casting rehabilitation as a project of both the offender and “the system” (presumably the proxy for society), Kennedy implicates the relationship between justice and mercy.²⁰⁸ Inasmuch as mercy issues from an authority's own ²⁰⁵ Id. at 446.

²⁰⁶ Id. at 447 (emphasis added).

²⁰⁷ See id. at 420 (identifying rehabilitation as “one . . . of [punishment's] three principal rationales”) (citing Harmelin, 501 U.S. at 999 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment)).

²⁰⁸ In a lecture given on the occasion of her assumption of the Henry J. Friendly Chair at Harvard Law School, Professor Carol Steiker provocatively explored the relationship between justice and mercy in the Jewish and Christian theological traditions and in U.S. criminal jurisprudence, arguing that a more candid and robust assertion of the role of mercy as a proper exercise of judicial discretion will advance, rather than vitiate, the aims of justice proper to the rule of law—i.e., giving each her or his due. Carol S. Steiker, The moral reasoning and exercise of discretion,²⁰⁹ Kennedy's coda reprises the theme that the morality of criminal punishment—especially capital punishment—has as much to do with those who impose it as with those on whom it is imposed. In this way, Kennedy appears to evince a sort of faith in society's moral capacity to grapple with the gravest depths and effects of child rape—perhaps, even, a perpetrator's capacity to atone for it. But these remarks are dicta. In so closing, Kennedy may not have clarified how this jurisprudence that necessarily embodies moral judgment should proceed. But it does offer a moral vision of sorts, setting forth inchoate dimensions of an integrative jurisprudence. Doing so invites critical comparison with other voices that attempt to do the same. It invites, that is, death penalty discourse. Catholic death penalty teaching can be one such relevant voice.

III. CATHOLIC DEATH PENALTY TEACHING

As used here, Catholic teaching refers to the “substantial body of literature on social questions” propagated by the Roman Catholic Church.²¹⁰ Formally speaking, this teaching is published under the aegis of church officials or official ecclesiastical bodies. Documents comprising it, though, are “the accepted expression of a [broader] social outlook that the Catholic tradition generates.”²¹¹ Thus, while official “Catholic teaching refers ... to the texts issued by those who hold an official teaching position within the Church,” its “influence comes from how the texts have been ‘translated’ into sermons, lectures, public programs, social Mercy Seat: Discretion, Justice, and Mercy in the American Criminal Justice System, address at Harvard Law School, Nov. 9, 2011 (copy provided by Professor Steiker on file; to be published in THE POLITICAL HEART OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE: ESSAYS ON THEMES OF WILLIAM J. STUNTZ (Michael Klarman, David Skeel, and Carol S. Steiker, eds., forthcoming, 2012)).

²⁰⁹ See id. at 4 (ascribing to Professor William J. Stuntz's work the proposition that “American criminal justice in our new millennium is in many ways more arbitrary, discriminatory, and unbalanced in terms of power than before the advent of ... discretion-cabining developments” in criminal procedure), 9 (arguing for a “‘prudential’ theory of mercy,” on the premise that there is “a place for the exercise of mercy in institutions of criminal justice regardless of which normative theory or theories of punishment th[at] criminal justice is thought to promote.” (citation omitted)).

²¹⁰ Himes, supra note 81, at 3. Examples include, e.g., PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR JUSTICE AND PEACE, COMPENDIUM OF THE SOCIAL DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH (2004) [hereinafter COMPENDIUM] (explicating key documents and themes of Catholic social teaching); USCCB, supra note 43 (setting forth church death penalty teaching in the U.S.).

²¹¹ Himes, supra note 81, at 3.

movements, acts of charity, just deeds, and peacemaking.”²¹² Accordingly, this “historical tradition of Catholic social thought” includes, e.g., medieval philosopher-theologian Thomas Aquinas’s Treatise on Law; international law pioneer Francisco Suarez’s Laws and God the Lawgiver; English lawyer-saint Thomas More’s Utopia, twentieth-century New York social activist Dorothy Day’s Catholic Worker editorials; and other literature by “Catholic thinkers who address social questions of their time from the perspective of faith. All of this and more [represents] ... Catholic social thought,” as related to but distinct from Catholic social teaching.²¹³ This Article draws upon both but, for more apposite comparison with Eighth Amendment jurisprudence, emphasizes the latter.²¹⁴

A. Historical background

Professors E. Christian Brugger and James J. Megivern have comprehensively treated Catholic/Christian death penalty teaching’s historical and theological arc, some aspects of which were introduced in Part I.²¹⁵ Surveying ²¹² Id.

²¹³ Id. (emphasis added).

²¹⁴ Concerning sources of Catholic social teaching and respective levels of authority, see Richard R. Gaillardetz, The Ecclesiological Foundations of Modern Catholic Social Teaching, MODERN CATHOLIC SOCIAL TEACHING 72, supra note 81. In descending order, (1) dogma, (2) definitive doctrine, (3) non-definitive but authoritative doctrine, and (4) prudential admonitions related to church discipline represent gradations of Church teaching’s authoritative status. Id. at 86-90. Applying that analysis, Professor Gaillardetz has described the Church’s death penalty teaching—specifically, its “restrictive conditions that must exist in order to justify capital punishment”—as an example of the third level. In other words, it represents a topic-focused specification of broader, more authoritative, universal moral principles—e.g., “the law of love, the dignity of the human person, [and] respect for human life.” Id. at 89. Accordingly, the teaching is among those having “emerge[d] out of the Church’s ecclesial reflection upon universal moral teachings in the light of theological inquiry, the insights of the human sciences, and rational reflection on human experience.” Id. In this way it is authoritative, but non-dogmatic—meaning it is not considered to be a part of divine revelation, but rather has been “shaped by changing moral contexts and contingent empirical data.” Id. at 90. The upshot? Catholic believers would be expected to treat the teaching “as more than mere opinion[] or pious exhortation,” and thus “must strive to integrate [it] into their religious outlook,” though “it is possible to imagine a Catholic who might be unable to accept [the] ... teaching as reflective of God’s will for humankind and [thus] could legitimately withhold giving an internal assent to it.” Id.

²¹⁵ See generally BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 59-138. Professor Megivern—whose study is not limited to Catholic Christianity—identifies five historical shifts in the Church’s approach to the death penalty: (1) the fourth the fifth centuries, when Christianity became the Roman Empire’s established religion; (2) the eighth and ninth centuries, when the western Church allied itself with secular powers; (3) the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, additional details here facilitates understanding Catholic teaching's present iteration, and the significance of its relatively recent near-abolitionist stance.

The death penalty in early Christianity was situated within an evolving relationship between religious and secular power. Second- and third-century theologians harmonized biblical warrants for the death penalty with endorsements of the state's right to impose it.²¹⁶ Once Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire this harmonization gave way, by the fifth century, to a "complex intertwining of Christian creed and Roman law definitively mark[ing] 'Imperial Christianity,'" and a concomitant "lethal combination of the Bible and Roman law."²¹⁷ Thus came the Church's official endorsement of capital punishment for crimes against the state or the faith—first with, but eventually without, the proviso that it be imposed by non-Christian authorities.²¹⁸ Prominent figures like Saint Augustine (354-430) sought to straddle a fine line, endorsing civil authority's right to inflict the death penalty, while preaching tenets of Gospel faith centered on proportional justice, the practice of mercy, and the hope for repentance.²¹⁹ Professor Kuttner's theory of religious-secular interpenetration looms large. So, too, we can observe how themes from Kennedy's coda, just discussed, echo a deep historico-religious tradition.

The medieval Church's consolidation of power corresponded with an articulation and eventual codification of an explicit pro-death penalty stance, limited only by a ban on clergy participation and an insistence that capital punishment follow from "proper motivation"—i.e., protection of the common good, which again parallels aspects of the preceding analysis of Kennedy.²²⁰ Legal commentary such as Gratian's Decretum (1139) affirmed secular powers' right to when the ascent of a centralized, monarchical papacy coincided with the rise of theological and canonical reflection on the use of lethal force to combat movements deemed heretical; (4) the fifteenth to seventeenth centuries, when the Protestant Reformation rocked the Western Church, and small groups of Christians began to oppose the religious use of (or imprimatur on) lethal force; and (5) the eighteenth to twentieth centuries, when many forces, both secular and religious, championed, and then gradually effected, abolition of the death penalty in much of the West. MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 3-4.

²¹⁶ BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 75.

²¹⁷ MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 27-45.

²¹⁸ Id. at 27-45. See also BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 74, 84-85.

²¹⁹ BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 89-93; MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 35-45.

²²⁰ BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 96-112, 112; MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 53-95.

impose death and provided that, while ecclesiastical authorities could not, they could summon the faithful to defend the faith by coercive, even fatal, means.²²¹ By the early thirteenth century, Pope Innocent III required a group of heretics reconciling with the Church to accept the Waldensian oath, declaring the non-imputability of mortal sin to civil authorities administering capital punishment.²²² Meanwhile, positivist affirmations of capital punishment found intellectual support in Saint Thomas Aquinas (1225-74), whose Summa Theologica affirmed exceptions to the Decalogue's prohibition against killing—capital sentences among them—on the premise of authority's duty to defend the common good.²²³ By the late medieval period, church-state collusion in capital punishment was settled in both theory and practice.²²⁴ Now-notorious extensions of this collusion appeared in the post-Reformation and Renaissance Church, when ecclesiastical authorities unhesitatingly endorsed the crusades and capital punishment for heresy.²²⁵

Thus by the time the Roman Catechism was published in 1566, which codified the wide range of doctrine regularized by the Council of Trent (1545-63), Catholic death penalty teaching likewise reached codified form:

Another kind of lawful slaying belongs to the civil authorities, to whom is entrusted power of life and death, by the legal and judicious exercise of which they punish the guilty and protect the innocent. The just use of this power . . . is an act of paramount obedience to [the Fifth] Commandment which prohibits murder . . . [and has as its end] the preservation and security of human life. Now the punishments inflicted by the civil authority, which is the legitimate avenger of crime, naturally tend to this end, since they give security to life by repressing outrage and violence.²²⁶

²²¹ MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 88-91; BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 100-02. The relevant portions from Gratian's Decretum are Causa XXIII, Questio V and Questio VIII.

²²² BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 103-07.

²²³ Id. at 108-111. See AQUINAS, SUMMA THEOLOGICA II-II, q. 64.

²²⁴ Id. at 112.

²²⁵ BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 119-22, and MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 107-11, offer frank treatments of this history.

²²⁶ CATECHISM OF THE COUNCIL OF TRENT FOR PARISH PRIESTS Pt. III (John A. McHugh & Charles J. Callan, trans. & eds., 1934) (translation provided in MEGIVERN, supra note 24, at 168 n.85, 170-71)). Catholicism was not unique in reconciling religio-cultural legalism with capital punishment: “[t]he other great Abrahamic religions, Judaism and Islam, have not historically sustained a strong pacifist or abolitionist tradition. Being Interpenetration looms large, presumably explaining, in part, why the summary of Catholic death penalty teaching reproduced in Part I(C), sounds as much like a text of secular jurisprudence as one specifically ecclesiastical.

B. Present Catholic teaching

Contemporary Catholic death penalty teaching has evolved in a manner akin to jurisprudence. Much of this stems from context: the Roman Catholic Church encompasses a highly organized structure of beliefs and authority, and law occupies a central position.²²⁷ Given these characteristics and their rootedness in the history just surveyed, it is unsurprising that the Church's own law and its commentary on secular law address punishment for intentional homicide. Thus the Code of Canon Law includes penal prescriptions for church members who commit homicide,²²⁸ while the Catechism addresses secular authority's responsibilities concerning criminal punishment for murder, outlining theoretical justifications for and both normative and utilitarian arguments against the death penalty.²²⁹

Given the history recited above, it is particularly noteworthy that Catholic teaching's longstanding premise that civil authority possesses a right to inflict capital punishment has become so conditioned that its present iteration closely religions of the law, they [too] encoded support for capital punishment early on." Jean Bethke Elshtain, Foreword, in RELIGION AND THE DEATH PENALTY, supra note 9, at xi.

²²⁷ Vatican City's sovereign status signals the Church's identity as a legal system. See The Holy See, VATICAN CITY STATE, http://www.vatican.va/vatican_city_state/index.htm (last visited Sept. 20, 2011). Its Code of Canon Law serves as a formal legal system governing ecclesiastical order. CODE OF CANON LAW: LATIN-ENGLISH EDITION (rev. trans., Canon Law Society of America, 1998). Its Catechism comprehensively surveys core aspects of Catholic belief and practice in a manner akin to Restatements in various fields of the law. See generally CCC, supra note 85.

That the Church represents a legal culture is attested to by its role in forming, and in being formed by, the broad Western legal tradition, see generally ch. 2, The Origin of the Western Legal Tradition in the Papal Revolution, in BERMAN, supra note 59, and by the characteristics of order and authority that it retains. For example, documents of the Second Vatican Council (1962-65) have the binding force of law for local Catholic entities throughout the world, governing everything from the Church's religious doctrines and vision for its role in society, to the framework for worship practices, institutional offices, and the identity, role, and responsibilities of clerics, religious orders, and laity. VATICAN COUNCIL II: VOLUME I, THE CONCILIAL AND POST CONCILIAL DOCUMENTS (Austin Flannery, ed., new rev. ed. 1996). An overview of the Church's conception of law appears in CCC, supra note 85, §§ 1949-1986, which it defines, at § 1951, as "a rule of conduct enacted by competent authority for the sake of the common good."

²²⁸ CODE OF CANON LAW, supra note 227, canon 1397.

²²⁹ See CCC, supra note 85 §§ 2265-67.

approaches the normative threshold of death penalty abolitionism. Contemporary Catholic death penalty teaching encompasses three, interrelated elements:

- (1) a restrictive presumption that the state may impose capital punishment only when necessary to protect human life;
- (2) a corollary affirmative presumption, premised on notions of human dignity and the common good, that endorses nonlethal protective force; and
- (3) an assumption that contemporary historical realities render rare, “if not practically nonexistent,” the likelihood that the first presumption will overcome the second.²³⁰

Versions of this formulation appear in the Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church,²³¹ the U.S. Catholic bishops’ statement advocating abolition of the death penalty,²³² and in academic commentary.²³³

²³⁰ See CCC, supra note 85 § 2267. The Catechism’s complete statement follows:

Assuming that the guilty party’s identity and responsibility have been fully determined, the traditional teaching of the Church does not exclude recourse to the death penalty, if this is the only possible way of effectively defending human lives against the unjust aggressor.

If, however, nonlethal means are sufficient to defend and protect people’s safety from the aggressor, authority will limit itself to such means, as these are more in keeping with the concrete conditions of the common good and are more in conformity to the dignity of the human person.

Today, in fact, as a consequence of the possibilities which the state has for effectively preventing crime, by rendering one who has committed an offense incapable of doing harm - without definitely taking away from him the possibility of redeeming himself - the cases in which the execution of the offender is an absolute necessity “are very rare, if not practically nonexistent.”

Id. (quoting John Paul II, Encyclical Letter Evangelium Vitae § 56 (1995)).

²³¹ The Compendium states that

[t]he Church sees as a sign of hope a growing public opposition to the death penalty, even when such a penalty is seen as a kind of legitimate defence on the part of society. . . . The growing aversion of public opinion towards the death penalty and the various provisions aimed at abolishing it or suspending its application constitute visible manifestations of a heightened moral awareness.

COMPENDIUM, supra note 43 § 405 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

²³² USCCB, supra note 43, at 12 (“In its traditional teaching as summarized in the Catechism of the Catholic Church, the Church affirms the right and duty of legitimate public authority to inflict punishment proportionate to the gravity of the offense. Recourse to the death penalty is not absolutely excluded: the death penalty is not intrinsically evil . . . Nevertheless, the Church teaches that in contemporary society where the state has other nonlethal means to protect its citizens, the state should not use the death penalty.”) (quotations omitted).

For purposes of comparing Catholic teaching to U.S. death penalty jurisprudence, elements of the preceding definition merit elaboration. From the premise of “safeguarding the common good,” the first presumption asserts that the state has a “[l]egitimate” right and “grave duty” to defend life against unjust aggression,²³⁴ and thus is not “exclude[d from] recourse to the death penalty[.]”²³⁵ But this presumption is restrictive, permitting capital punishment only where an aggressor’s identity and guilt have been ascertained, and where execution is “the only possible” effective means for the state to fulfill its protective duty.²³⁶ The teaching does not flesh out what these limitations should look like. But that is unsurprising, for the Church’s position is meant to frame the death penalty’s moral contours, not provide civil authority with a blueprint for law proper to its sphere.²³⁷

In any event, restricting the premise that the state has the right to execute people is fleshed out in the teaching’s second presumption, asserting that the state should limit itself to nonlethal defensive means sufficiently capable of achieving its protective obligation. This normative prescription includes the important substantive assumption that nonlethal protective means “are more in keeping with the concrete conditions of the common good and are more in conformity to the dignity of the human person.”²³⁸ As the preceding discussion made clear, these norms are a critical hinge for comparing the Catholic and U.S. approaches.

The teaching’s third component argues that historical developments have made effective, alternative protective means sufficiently available that instances today when capital punishment “is an absolute necessity ‘are very rare, if not practically nonexistent.’”²³⁹ Notable is this component’s combination of ²³³ See generally, e.g., BRUGGER, supra note 63; MEGIVERN, supra note 63; Avery Cardinal Dulles, Catholic Teaching on the Death Penalty: Has It Changed?, in RELIGION AND THE DEATH PENALTY 23, supra note 9; Ghoshray, supra note 17.

²³⁴ CCC, supra note 85 §§ 2265-66.

²³⁵ Id. §2267.

²³⁶ Id.; see also COMPENDIUM, supra note 210 § 405 (same).

²³⁷ See USCCB, supra note 43. Moreover, not providing a more specific blueprint is consistent with the principle, also central to Catholic social teaching, that civil authority occupies its own proper sphere. See discussion infra, note 254 and accompanying text.

²³⁸ CCC, supra note 85 § 2267.

²³⁹ Id. (quoting Evangelium Vitae, supra note 230 § 56).

utilitarianism with a normative assertion verging on abolitionism,²⁴⁰ as seen in the U.S. Catholic bishops' iteration of the general teaching:

[1] The sanction of death, when it is not necessary to protect society, violates respect for human life and dignity.

[2] State-sanctioned killing in our names diminishes all of us.

[3] Its application is deeply flawed and can be irreversibly wrong, is prone to errors, and is biased by factors such as race, the quality of legal representation, and where the crime was committed.

[4] We have other ways to punish criminals and protect society.²⁴¹

Worth noting is the assertion that the death penalty “diminishes” society as a whole (presumably in a moral sense), echoing the commentary by Andrew Cohen and Ty Alper cited earlier, and dicta in Kennedy.²⁴² Nor is the resonance exclusively contemporary: prominent early American jurist and statesman Edward Livingston urged restricting the death penalty in strikingly similar words:

The right to inflict death exists, but . . . it must be in defense, either of the individual or social existence; and it is limited to the case where no other alternative remains to prevent the threatened destruction. Societies have existed without it. . . . In those societies, therefore, it was not necessary. Is there anything in the state of ours that makes it so?²⁴³

Interpenetration again looms large. For further comparative purposes it is important to highlight meta-juridical themes informing the positivist elements of Catholic teaching, as many echo elements of U.S. death penalty jurisprudence.

C. Catholic teaching as jurisprudence

Most relevant to this Article's comparative approach to capital punishment as law and morality jurisprudence are Catholic teaching's attention to authority and moral order, human dignity and the common good, and the purposes of ²⁴⁰ In “renew[ing] [their] call” to end the death penalty, the U.S. Catholic bishops described it as both “unnecessary”—a utilitarian assertion—and “unjustified in our time and circumstances,” which is a normative consideration. USCCB, supra note 43, at 4.

²⁴¹ Id.

²⁴² Compare discussion supra, notes 34-38 and accompanying text, with Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 420.

²⁴³ MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 304-05 n.4 (citation omitted).

punishment. Moreover, their conceptual development in Church teaching over time suggests how that teaching can engage broader death penalty discourse.

I. Summary of meta-judicial themes

The Church's traditional death penalty teaching intertwined transcendent and temporal conceptions of existential order. Civil authority had a duty, in concert with ecclesiastical authority, to ensure that a fallen social order would as closely as possible approximate the perfect order ordained by God.²⁴⁴ Saint Augustine expressed this view in his "Two Cities" metaphor, envisioning order as the most important characteristic that temporal and religious authority share.²⁴⁵ Given his generally dim conception of human moral fallibility, authority's role maintaining order was largely coercive.²⁴⁶ One can see how permissive approaches to capital punishment would accord with such a view.

In contrast, Saint Thomas Aquinas asserted that authority could positively shape order and advance the human condition, conceiving of both civil and ecclesiastical authority in terms of parental solicitude.²⁴⁷ This metaphor informed justice and punishment.²⁴⁸ Also crucial was what Aquinas, and the subsequent Catholic tradition, understood to be the integrating principle of natural law.²⁴⁹ In broad strokes, Catholic natural law theory holds that, inasmuch as principles of divine law are inscribed in the order of nature and in human conscience, positive

²⁴⁴ ANDREW SKOTNICKI, CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND THE CATHOLIC CHURCH 39-44 (2008).

²⁴⁵ SAINT AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO, CITY OF GOD, in AUGUSTINE: POLITICAL WRITINGS 3 (Michael W. Tcaz & Douglas Kries trans., Ernest L. Fortin & Douglas Kries eds., 1994).

²⁴⁶ SKOTNICKI, supra note 244, at 39-41.

²⁴⁷ See generally SAINT THOMAS AQUINAS, ON THE GOVERNANCE OF RULERS (Gerald B. Phelan ed., 1938), ON LAW, MORALITY, AND POLITICS (Richard J. Regan & William P. Baumgarth, trans. & eds., 2nd ed. 2003); I-II SUMMA THEOLOGICA qq. 87, 94, 96, 105. Skotnicki, supra note 244, at 41-44, cogently summarizes Aquinas's thought here.

²⁴⁸ See SKOTNICKI, supra note 244, at 41-44.

²⁴⁹ Much of Catholic moral and social teaching stems from the natural law tradition, on the basis of which "the Catholic Church has maintained [that] it is possible to formulate teaching that really does speak to all people in all settings." Himes, supra note 80, at 5. This premise is not immune from epistemological and other critiques, akin to those many legal scholars pose to natural law theorists. Here it suffices to assert, simply as a descriptive matter, that part of Catholic death penalty teaching's salience lies in its rootedness in the broad Western legal tradition, elements themselves of which are indebted to natural law theory. See, e.g., BERMAN, supra note 59, at 144-47.

law can articulate rationally discernible, universalizable norms.²⁵⁰ This approach permitted Aquinas to assert that civil law should not contradict divine law, while affirming that religious and secular spheres possess respective, proper roles.²⁵¹

Drawing on this tradition, Catholic social teaching today, including on the death penalty, endorses an epistemological and juridical distinction between the religious and secular spheres as having proper sources of authority, modes of reasoning, and responsibilities in social order.²⁵² Theoretically, then, Catholic and secular perspectives can be “translated.” The Church’s approach to human dignity, human rights, and the common good, as three interrelated principles of moral order meant to inform positive law, represent specific terms of substantive translation.

First, a theological premise—“The Church sees in men and women, in every person, the living image of God”²⁵³—orients the Church’s conception of human dignity. But it also identifies its secular, social dimensions:

“the social order and its development must invariably work to the benefit of the human person, since the order of things is to be subordinate to the order of persons, and not the other way around.”[] . . . [Thus i]t is necessary to “consider every neighbor without ²⁵⁰ In its simplest form, Catholic natural law theory rests on the premise that human reason bears the capacity to reflect on “nature”—in a sense, the reality of creation, understood to be given by God—and from that reflection to abstract transcendent moral norms and laws the obedience to which, via codification in human positive law, facilitates full human flourishing. See generally COMPENDIUM, supra note 210 §§ 140-42; Stephen J. Pope, Natural Law in Catholic Social Teachings, in MODERN CATHOLIC SOCIAL TEACHING, supra note 81, at 41. Cf. BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY, supra note 59, at 866 (defining natural law, in part, as “[a] philosophical system of legal and moral principles purportedly deriving from a universalized conception of human nature or divine justice”).

²⁵¹ SKOTNICKI, supra note 244, at 42, 42-44.

²⁵² The COMPENDIUM provides:

[T]he distinction between the political and religious spheres . . . is a value that has been attained and recognized by the Catholic Church and belongs to the inheritance of contemporary civilization. . . . The social doctrine of the Church is not an intrusion into the government of individual countries[,] . . . [inasmuch as t]he principle of autonomy involves respect for every religious confession on the part of the State[.] . . . In a pluralistic society, secularity is a place for communication between the different spiritual traditions and the nation.

COMPENDIUM, supra note 210 §§ 571-72 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). This view is consistent with Catholic teaching’s affirmation that the state possesses the right, in principle, to inflict capital punishment.

²⁵³ Id. §§ 140-42.

exception as another self, taking into account first of all his life and the means necessary for living it with dignity.” Every political, economic, social, scientific and cultural programme must be inspired by the awareness of the primacy of each human being over society²⁵⁴

That Catholic moral reasoning tenets have explicit social dimensions making them “translatable” to the secular sphere should be evident in this normative counsel.

Church teaching’s situation of human dignity within a broad conception of human rights offers further evidence. Following Pope John XXIII’s endorsement of “universal, inviolable, and inalienable” human rights in his 1963 encyclical Pacem in Terris, the Second Vatican Council signaled the Church’s engagement of modern human rights theory: “the movement towards the identification and proclamation of human rights is one of the most significant attempts to respond effectively to the inescapable demands of human dignity.”²⁵⁵ Per Catholic social theory, however, both human dignity and human rights necessarily have a social context, framed in terms of the common good, which the Second Vatican Council defined as “the sum total of social conditions which allow people, either as groups or as individuals, to reach their fulfillment more fully and more easily.”²⁵⁶ These principles—human dignity, human rights, and the common good—inform Catholic canon law,²⁵⁷ and are evident in its death penalty teaching.

²⁵⁴ Id. § 132 (quoting Second Vatican Council, Gaudium et Spes § 26, 27 (1965); citing CCC, supra note 85 § 2235).

²⁵⁵ COMPENDIUM, supra note 210 § 152 (citing Second Vatican Council, Declaration on Religious Freedom Dignitatis Humanae § 1 (1965)). See also David Hollenbach, Human Dignity in Catholic Thought 1, 6, in CAMBRIDGE HANDBOOK ON HUMAN DIGNITY (forthcoming, 2012; draft on file with author) (describing as “a remarkable development,” historically speaking, “the Roman Catholic community’s . . . emerg[ence] as a vigorous global advocate of human rights,” and its status as “a participant in what John Rawls has called an ‘overlapping consensus’ on a public philosophy of human dignity and human rights . . . [allowing] people from diverse religions or cultures [to] reach agreement on the ethical standards for the institutions that structure their lives together.”).

²⁵⁶ Pastoral Constitution Gaudium et Spes § 76 (1965). See also COMPENDIUM, supra note 210 §§ 164-70 (summarizing the concept of the common good in both church tradition and contemporary sources).

²⁵⁷ John Paul II, Address to the Tribunal of the Roman Rota (Feb. 17, 1979), http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/speeches/1979/february/documents/hf_jp-ii_spe_19790217_roman-rotta_en.html (last visited Sept. 20, 2011) (“Canon law agrees with and fosters . . . the affirmation of the self as an authentically social being through acknowledgement of and respect for the other as a person endowed with universal, inviolable, and inalienable rights and invested with a transcendent dignity.”).

Indeed, affirming human dignity is part and parcel of authority's protective role, which itself is conceived in terms of ensuring the common good within a broadly integrated moral and political order:

Considering the human person as the foundation and purpose of the political community means in the first place working to recognize and respect human dignity through defending and promoting fundamental and inalienable human rights: "In our time the common good is chiefly guaranteed when personal rights and duties are maintained."[] The rights and duties of the person contain a concise summary of the principal moral and juridical requirements that must preside over the construction of the political community. These requirements constitute an objective norm on which positive law is based²⁵⁸

For these reasons, recourse to capital punishment is permissible if it is the only means of securing order, and insofar as it gives way, wherever possible, to nonlethal protective means more in conformity with human dignity. In other words, utilitarian ends such as protecting the body politic are never only utilitarian. Such protection never can be divorced from a corporate, social moral identity, human dignity being its substantive core. Thus, norms for criminal punishment that deeply grapple with human dignity reflect as much on a body politic as on those whom it condemns, to employ a rephrasing of secular legal commentators' view of contemporary capital punishment's socially reflexive moral resonance.²⁵⁹

What Catholic death penalty teaching does not spell out is how, in a pluralistic culture with a separation of church and state, civil authority determines, so as to uphold, the substantive content of "human dignity" lest it remain a mere shibboleth, to recall Professor Moore's moral reasoning analysis.²⁶⁰ Here this Article's treatment of death penalty jurisprudence echoes the Catholic tradition, and may aid its own development. That this tradition has developed and yet still can, thus serving as a conversation partner to a broader integrative jurisprudence, is a premise that the tradition itself supports, as the following subsection argues.

2. Development of doctrine

Cardinal John Henry Newman offered the first modern systematic theory of the development of doctrine, a theory important to Catholic theology and social ²⁵⁸ COMPENDIUM, supra note 210 § 388 (citations omitted).

²⁵⁹ See notes 34-38, supra, and accompanying text.

²⁶⁰ See note 149, supra, and accompanying text.

teaching, in 1845 in An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, though its theoretical roots stretch back at least to Aquinas.²⁶¹ Professor Robert Kennedy has described how versions of the doctrine turn on two analyses: (1) the degree of a teaching's authoritativeness in the Church; and (2) whether a "developed" expression of that teaching represents a basic translation of the tradition into a new language or context, a new formulation for a previously-unaddressed situation, or a reformulation of what came before, in light of or as applied to new realities.²⁶²

Judge John T. Noonan, Jr., a prominent Catholic scholar and judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, has significantly contributed to this scholarship.²⁶³ His approach is germane here given his versatility with both the Catholic intellectual tradition and American jurisprudence. As he observes,

[c]onditions and practices have at times anticipated the development of moral doctrine within the Church and given rise to the development. An economy based on commercial credit preceded the revision of the rules on usury. The rise of democratic, liberal societies, most notably the United States, preceded Vatican II's Declaration of Religious Liberty. The very general practice of civil divorce preceded the current practice of divorce by papal rescript. The abolition of slavery almost everywhere was in advance of Vatican II's categorical condemnation of slavery.²⁶⁴

²⁶¹ See generally, e.g., JOHN T. NOONAN, A CHURCH THAT CAN AND CANNOT CHANGE: THE DEVELOPMENT OF CATHOLIC MORAL TEACHING (2005); Christopher Kaczor, Thomas Aquinas on the Development of Doctrine, 62 THEOLOGICAL STUDIES 283 (2001).

²⁶² Robert G. Kennedy, Development of Doctrine in Moral Theology: Can What Was Once Wrong Now Be Right?, 1 U. ST. THOMAS L.J. 253, 255-57 (2003). Concerning levels of authority accorded to substantive Church teaching, see note 214, supra, and accompanying text.

²⁶³ It should be noted that while Catholic scholars do not universally accept Judge Noonan's approach to doctrinal development, the merits and implications of this intra-Catholic debate are beyond the scope of this Article. Compare, e.g., M. Cathleen Kaveny, Development of Catholic Moral Doctrine: Probing the Subtext, 1 U. ST. THOMAS L.J. 234, 235 (2003) (describing Judge Noonan's approach and debates it has triggered) with Kennedy, supra note 262, at 255-57, 264-72 (critiquing elements of Judge Noonan's account of evolutionary doctrinal development in the Church's moral theology).

For an instructive comparison of change within religious legal systems, see Silvio Ferrari, Adapting Divine Law to Change: The Experience of the Roman Catholic Church (With Some Reference to Jewish and Islamic Law), 28 CARDOZO L. REV. 53 (2006) (distinguishing between particular religions' notions of immutable divine law, and historical and theological forces admitting of change at the level of application). Professor Ferrari also addresses change in death penalty teaching in Jewish law. Id. at 54-55.

²⁶⁴ NOONAN, supra note 261, at 210

To summarize: the “development of moral doctrine can and does occur by human experience leading to better understanding of human nature.”²⁶⁵

This perspective evokes the theory of religious-secular interpenetration. Moreover, inasmuch as Judge Noonan urges that a kind of “deepening” inherent in the development of doctrine, which yields more profound understanding through, in relevant part, the “intellectual, moral, emotional, and social[development] of human beings,”²⁶⁶ his analysis also evokes Professor Berman’s vision of integrative jurisprudence. Both doctrinal development and integrative jurisprudence, then, represent a process that engages a community, guided by its authoritative sources, as these sources are reflected in new understandings of human realities for which those sources have normative value and provide normative direction. As Professor Cathleen Kaveny has argued,

[i]n both moral theology and law, questions of development cannot be addressed in the abstract; they must be addressed in the relevant context. What, concretely, does this mean? In my view, it puts us to work. We cannot hope to address the pressing questions of our day in the context of [a given] ... moral tradition without knowing that tradition.²⁶⁷

The development of doctrine both describes and helps to explain what has occurred in Catholic death penalty teaching.²⁶⁸ One need only juxtapose the Roman Catechism of 1566 and the present Catechism to see the historical shift.²⁶⁹ The former emphasizes the state’s protective function and right to impose retributive punishment; the latter includes these assumptions but emphasizes human dignity. This is more than an addition of words. When Pope John Paul II’s encyclical letter Evangelium Vitae was published in 1995, then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger (now Pope Benedict XVI) characterized the encyclical’s death penalty teaching as “important doctrinal progress,” acknowledging that it would require revision of the Catechism, which occurred in 1997.²⁷⁰ Professor Brugger has ²⁶⁵ Id. at 213.

²⁶⁶ Id. at 216.

²⁶⁷ See Kaveny, supra note 263, at 252.

²⁶⁸ See BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 141 (applying approaches to doctrinal development to Catholic death penalty teaching).

²⁶⁹ Compare notes 85 & 226, and accompanying text.

²⁷⁰ See MEGIVERN, supra note 63, at 1 (citing NAT’L CATHOLIC REPORTER 3 (Apr. 7, 1995)).

described Evangelium Vitae's statement of the "extremely rare, if not practically nonexistent" principle in its reflection on the death penalty as having "received more notice than any other [topic] in the entire [encyclical]." ²⁷¹

Scholars debate to what extent the Catechism's revised statement on the death penalty technically represents a development of doctrine. ²⁷² But however it is characterized, a shift occurred. ²⁷³ Moreover, it implies that longstanding meta-juridical norms concerning authority, moral order, justice, and punishment are better understood in light of evolving historical context. ²⁷⁴ Interpenetration looms large given that change in the Catholic teaching can, at least in part, be ascribed to historical realities in which the Church finds itself, not simply that exist within it alone. Catholic teaching has learned from "the world," while its teaching's deep roots in Western jurisprudence and its capacity to employ contemporary categories of jurisprudence mean that schools of thought operative in today's world may be able to learn from its own evolutive process. Part IV addresses this possibility.

²⁷¹ BRUGGER, supra note 63, at 10.

²⁷² Compare, e.g., BRUGGER supra note 63, at 163 (concluding that present teaching consistently applies Catholic tradition to changed historical contexts, while incorporating theoretical premises, such as human rights theory, of more recent vintage), and James J. Megivern, Judge Noonan, Church Change, and the Death Penalty, 1 U. ST. THOMAS L.J. 274, 277 (2003) (describing Pope John Paul II's approach to the death penalty as one of "remarkable change"), with Dulles, supra note 233, at 27-28 (critiquing elements of Professor Brugger's analysis, and emphasizing the present doctrine's "prudential judgment that . . . the death penalty is held to be undesirable in a society like our own, because of circumstances that would render the application harmful." (emphasis added)).

²⁷³ In a 2002 address at Georgetown University, Justice Scalia expressed frustration with the Church's "change" on the death penalty: "No authority that I know of denies the 2,000-year-old tradition of the church approving capital punishment. . . . I don't see why there's been a change." Professor Megivern has countered Justice Scalia's view, arguing that Church history is hardly univocal in its death penalty teaching or practice. Megivern, supra note 272, at 275, 277-78 (citing Anne Thompson, Scalia: Stuck in the Past, WASH. POST, Feb. 26, 2002, at A21).

²⁷⁴ Megivern, supra note 272, at 280-83 (arguing that change in the Church's teaching owes to the post-Vatican II embrace of an historical consciousness, the Church's embrace of human rights theory, and personal leadership by Pope John Paul II, a staunch death penalty foe). See also Michael J. Perry, Capital Punishment and the Morality of Human Rights, 44 J. CATH. LEGAL STUD. 1, 2-3 (2005) (situating Catholic death penalty teaching within a broad "global morality" of human dignity-premised human rights).

IV. ADVANCING DEATH PENALTY DISCOURSE

“Religious concerns do not exist in a vacuum; they necessarily affect the values encompassed by the freedom of expression.”²⁷⁵ Nor does a death penalty jurisprudence that necessarily embodies moral judgment exist in a vacuum, this Article’s comparison demonstrating that such jurisprudence engages moral reasoning values within broad public discourse, with religious perspectives a part. Perhaps for this reason Kennedy’s conceptual vagaries can be forgiven. Though even if they are, that is no reason not to improve. If this jurisprudence necessarily embodying moral judgment is to be integrative—i.e., culturally believable or resonant, and judicially administrable—then both its language of human dignity-affirming proportionate punishment and its means of ensuring it must cohere with the evolving standards of decency of “the society so characterizing it.”²⁷⁶ This requires a broad public discourse attentive to varied sources and voices that are both competent and willing to offer moral reasoning perspectives. Religious perspectives that are not sheer fideism, which divorces faith from reason, or fundamentalism, which is unwilling to engage diversity, thus have a role to play.

A. Development of doctrine and evolving standards of decency

This Article asserts that Catholic death penalty teaching can be one such voice. For it offers considerably more, historically and conceptually, than mere moral exhortation unmoored from the categories of reasoning proper to a secular legal context. It qualifies, that is, as jurisprudence. Moreover, nor is U.S. death penalty jurisprudence a matrix of statutory and case law unswayed by dynamic, meta-judicial categories of moral reasoning—many of which, the preceding analysis shows, resonate not only with the form but, in several instances, with the tone if not substance of Catholic death penalty teaching’s own meta-judicial categories. Both, that is, are examples of a jurisprudence that necessarily embodies moral judgment. But if this jurisprudence is to be integrative, intentional discourse is required of its socially, morally conscious interlocutors. Here the Catholic tradition’s theory of the development of doctrine can prove helpful.

As discussed, situating a teaching’s authority is central to the development of doctrine as an analytical construct. Just as the “jurisprudence” of Catholic death penalty teaching taps into a larger construct of authoritative Church teaching, post-Kennedy death penalty jurisprudence could benefit from more clearly demarcating levels of moral authority proper to constructing, describing, and reviewing the evolving standards of decency. Such a project would stress that the relationship between the objective indicia and independent judgment analyses concerns more than jurisdiction counting, and requires assessing the nature of majoritarian judgments. It could, for example, test for and distinguish between necessarily morally reasoned judgments (e.g., a death sentence is proportionate punishment for child rape because _____), versus intuitional judgments about moral questions (e.g., child rape is among the most depraved of crimes, thus justifying death).

²⁷⁵ Marshall, supra note 50, at 546.

²⁷⁶ Furman, 408 U.S. at 382 (Burger, C.J., dissenting).

Such an analysis goes to the core issue of authority dividing the Kennedy justices, and arguably has as an analogue in jurisprudence examining whether a challenged state action is impermissibly pretextual. It also may put a greater onus on justices' exercise of independent judgment, forcing them to articulate substantive moral precepts—e.g., concerning human dignity—in terms of jurisprudence, which could avoid their devolution to mere moral shibbolethism. The Catholic theory of the development of doctrine could prove an aid here, as well, given its rootedness in careful assessments of what constitutes doctrine per se.²⁷⁷ This, too, is an authority question, requiring judges “to judge.”²⁷⁸ And this we need judges to do, since neither political majorities nor their representatives can as efficiently, not to mention as authoritatively, discern and decide how, whether, and when the results of political process cohere with the Constitution. To rely on another analogous comparison, Catholic death penalty teaching has—but, only relatively recently—come up with a way to relate human dignity both to a criminal offender's rights, and to the common good as a whole.²⁷⁹ There is no reason that U.S. death penalty jurisprudence cannot do something similar; indeed, scholars argue that it already has, or is moving that way.²⁸⁰

²⁷⁷ See generally NOONAN, supra note 261, chs. 28-33 (prescribing various tests for determining a developing teaching's doctrinal authenticity).

²⁷⁸ See Moore, supra note 17, at 65, and discussion at note 150 and accompanying text.

²⁷⁹ See discussion supra, notes 253-58 and accompanying text.

²⁸⁰ See note 185 supra; see also Leslie Meltzer Henry, The Jurisprudence of Dignity, 160 U. PA. L. REV. 169 (2011) (offering an empirical and typological analysis of Supreme Court opinions' employment of the concept of dignity, and arguing that “[f]ew words play a more central role in modern constitutional law without appearing in the Constitution than ‘dignity.’ The term appears in more than nine hundred ... opinions, but ... is a concept in disarray.”).

For example, assuming that U.S. death penalty jurisprudence continues “decently to evolve,”²⁸¹ analyses akin to Catholic doctrinal development may be useful given its attention to synthetic, historical reflection on moral order, the common good, justice, and equity as fleshing out the meaning of human dignity and its impact on the various justifications for punishment. This may be what we see in those whose long immersion in this jurisprudence leads to them concluding that the death penalty’s continued practice cannot be squared with the Constitution’s norms. Justice Stevens’s statement in Baze merits closer scrutiny:

current decisions by state legislatures, by the Congress of the United States, and by this Court to retain the death penalty as a part of our law are the product of habit and inattention rather than an acceptable deliberative process that weighs the costs and risks of administering that penalty against its identifiable benefits, and rest in part on a faulty assumption about the retributive force of the death penalty.²⁸²

The discursive process that Justice Stevens—then the Court’s most senior justice—commends coheres with this Article’s thesis. For one could interpret his critique as a reflection on the fact that, in the decades since Gregg, the moral reasoning inherent to wrestling with capital punishment itself became instructive, became a tool for working through the Court’s complex Eighth Amendment jurisprudence.²⁸³ That Justice Scalia, the Court’s then next most senior member, found Justice Stevens’s about-face so disturbing may but reflect the fact that doctrinal development, inasmuch as it is engaged in by a diverse community of interpreters, is neither a predictable process nor a straightjacket.²⁸⁴ Indeed, the ²⁸¹ Professor Goodman closes her study of human dignity in constitutional jurisprudence by observing that “our standard of decency continues to evolve,” and arguing that “[i]f the evolution is slow, but steady, human dignity will routinely weigh into the Court’s constitutional analysis as a value having a constant strength (rather than varying in strength according to popular opinion) during the next fifty years.” Goodman, supra note 185, at 794 (citation omitted). Writing in 2006, Professor Goodman’s prediction might be seen as prescient, given this Article’s reading of Kennedy.

²⁸² Baze, 553 U.S. at 78 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment).

²⁸³ See, e.g., Carol S. Steiker, The Marshall Hypothesis Revisited, 52 How. L.J. 525, 554 (2009) (“To the extent that various Justices’ partial or total rejection of capital punishment is grounded in their deeper knowledge about the death penalty developed through their long-term exposure to its implementation, then perhaps their ‘own judgment’ is a helpful guide for discerning ‘evolving standards of decency’ rather than an evasion of that duty.”); see also Lyke, supra note 185, at 649 (characterizing the evolution of Justice Kennedy’s Eighth Amendment views).

²⁸⁴ Baze, 553 U.S. at 87-89 (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment).

merits and limitations of such a deliberative process as engaged by the Supreme Court rather than legislative bodies are alive in the differences between Justices Stevens and Scalia in Baze, and in Kennedy's majority and dissenting opinions.²⁸⁵ But this, it would seem, is all the more reason for scholars, lawyers, jurists, and other parties involved in death penalty discourse to engage in a process of clarifying what the evolving standards of decency, and its reference to human dignity, mean and require when authority would inflict the ultimate punishment. For example, Catholic teaching continues to develop retributive theory counter-balanced by restorative emphases.²⁸⁶ So, too, rehabilitation theory has traction in U.S. jurisprudence—some suggesting that Kennedy and another signal Eighth Amendment case, Panetti v. Quarterman, augur this development—in which case these developments in both traditions could impact death penalty discourse.²⁸⁷ As Professor Michael Radelet has argued, the retributive “calculation” of just punishment for murder—or for any crime, for that matter—is unsusceptible of empirical calculation, unlike deterrence and incapacitation arguments. In this respect, capital punishment in particular “becomes more a moral and less a criminological issue.”²⁸⁸

²⁸⁵ Compare the concurring opinions of Justices Stevens and Scalia in Baze, discussed supra, with the rejoinder in Section V of Kennedy to what might be termed “judicial fiat” criticisms of the majority’s conclusion, Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 446-47, versus the dissent’s argument that the majority’s justifications were unsound. Id. at 447 (Alito, J., dissenting).

²⁸⁶ See, e.g., UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS, RESPONSIBILITY, REHABILITATION, AND RESTORATION: A CATHOLIC PERSPECTIVE ON CRIME AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE (2000), available at <http://www.usccb.org/issues-and-action/human-life-and-dignity/criminal-justice-restorative-justice/crime-and-criminal-justice.cfm> (last accessed Jan. 30, 2012).

²⁸⁷ See, e.g., Dan Markel, Executing Retributivism: Panetti and the Future of the Eighth Amendment, 103 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1163, 1213 n.189 (arguing that a shift in the Supreme Court’s thinking on retributivism in Panetti, 551 U.S. at 930, which addressed the legitimacy of the death penalty for those defendants who do not rationally understand why they are being executed, has implications for undermining the death penalty’s justification, and describing Kennedy v. Louisiana’s treatment of retribution and its additional focus on rehabilitation theory); Carol S. Steiker, Panetti v. Quarterman: Is There a “Rational Understanding” of the Supreme Court’s Eighth Amendment Jurisprudence?, 5 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 285, 290 (2007) (arguing that the Court’s decision in Panetti “leaves us . . . with more global questions about the proper scope of Eighth Amendment constraints on punishment and the methodology for determining that scope.”).

²⁸⁸ Michael L. Radelet, The Role of Organized Religions in Changing Death Penalty Debates, 9 WM. & MARY BILL RTS. J. 201, 209 (2000). As Professor Radelet argues:

We cannot gather data to prove, one way or another, how much of a given punishment (or benefit) any prisoner (or non-prisoner) “deserves.”

Having returned to the law and morality question, it is possible now to offer some concluding reflections about translating between moral reasoning paradigms for the purposes of discourse, of “dialogue on crime and corrections, justice and mercy.”²⁸⁹

B. Translation for discourse

This Article having argued the necessity of death penalty discourse more intentionally attuned to the moral dimensions of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence, how will such discourse occur, especially where the signal nuances of its various interlocutors—e.g., “Catholic” versus “American,” to paint with a broad brush—differ radically? Professor Gregory Kalscheur has proposed axioms that can guide religious-secular dialogue while upholding the distinctive nature and independence of their respective spheres and institutions.²⁹⁰ Several of these highlight how

How much we all deserve, instead is a cultural determination greatly influenced by prevailing standards of morality. . . . And since retribution rests on more of a moral base than an empirical one, it is fundamentally a question that religious denominations need to address. The future of the death penalty in the United States will be greatly influenced by how religious leaders and organizations deal with this issue.

Id. at 213-14.

²⁸⁹ UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS, supra note 286, at 1.

²⁹⁰ Gregory A. Kalscheur, John Paul II, John Courtney Murray, and the Relationship Between Civil Law and Moral Law: A Constructive Proposal for Contemporary American Pluralism, Boston College Law School Public Law and Legal Theory Research Paper Series, Research Paper No. 38 (May 21, 2004), available at <http://ssrn.com/abstract=550201>. Professor Kalscheur’s proposed six axioms are:

- (1) The distinction between state and society and public and private morality must be respected. . . .
- (2) The moral concerns that govern good lawmaking may sometimes demand that civil law not be used to restrain every offense against public morality. . . .
- (3) Any evaluation of the degree to which the civil law conforms to the moral law should consider the legal framework in its entirety. It is not sufficient simply to try to enact criminal prohibitions of offenses against public morality. . . .
- (4) The church as a mediating institution has a crucial role to play in bringing moral and religious critique of law and public policy into public conversation. The primary context for this role is the realm of society and culture. . . .
- (5) Moral and religious dialogue is a crucial component of any effort to maintain the connection between the moral order and the civil law. . . .
- (6) [Religious documents that] call for a necessary conformity of the civil law to the moral law can play a constructive role in public discourse concerning the law and the moral intuitions that inform it require a process of translation—a process at the heart of comparative law. In a sense, what is required is a “grammar” consisting of intelligible principles that surface and bring into conversation the content of one and then another language—e.g., “Catholic” and “American” death penalty discourse.²⁹¹

But such conversation is only a beginning, for then the hard work of immersion occurs. The traditions must speak with each other, learning their respective nuances, benefiting from the self-critical reflective processes that immersion stimulates, and articulating new presumptions and applications as a result. Such an iterative process is what the theory of doctrinal development is about and, arguably, what evolving standards of decency are about. Justice Stevens’s brief concurring opinion in Simmons sets this out:

Perhaps even more important than our specific holding today is our reaffirmation of the basic principle that informs the Court’s interpretation of the Eighth Amendment. If the meaning of that Amendment had been frozen when it was originally drafted, it would impose no impediment to the execution of 7-year-old children today. . . . The evolving standards of decency that have driven our construction of this critically important part of the Bill of Rights foreclose any such reading of the Amendment. *In the best tradition of the common law, the pace of that evolution is a matter for continuing debate . . .*²⁹²

As Justice Stevens seems to recognize, some iterations will fail the test of translation across time. Others will cast fresh light on new and challenging questions in the same way that any student of a language often discovers that she learns something new, or perceives something deeper, about her own language and the culture that it represents precisely in virtue of the fact that she has brought them into dialogue with another. This is the process, not simply of translation, but policy discourse so long as the claims of the moral law are presented in a way that is publicly accessible and intelligible.

Id. at 28-37.

²⁹¹ As Professor M. Cathleen Kaveny has argued, with respect to religious claims in public discourse, “careful attention to the actual function and use of argumentation to persuade others of a particular viewpoint may yield a more nuanced understanding of how religious warrants should be used by believing individuals when arguing in their capacity as citizens.” M. Cathleen Kaveny, Religious Claims and the Dynamics of Argument, 36 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 423, 429 (2001).

²⁹² Simmons, 543 U.S. at 587 (Stevens, J., concurring) (citation omitted; emphasis added).

of interpenetration.²⁹³ This Article has argued that such a process not only is possible, but in fact already has occurred: a putatively absolute incompatibility of religious perspectives on the death penalty and U.S. death penalty jurisprudence does not bear out. Three proposals now emerge for furthering constructive death penalty discourse.

First, the legal academy would do well to continue to refine the grammar and syntax of death penalty jurisprudence's necessarily moral judgment. Such a project would do well to proceed in an interdisciplinary manner, just as this Article has interwoven historical theology, moral philosophy, and law. In doing so, legal scholars can identify key principles that stem from a variety of traditions of moral reasoning, whether of a religious or broadly humanistic bent. This process can serve to analytically disentangle various threads of cultural moral discourse that the interpenetration phenomenon has brought together, and identify and articulate principles of translation that can assist in clarifying what different contributors to broad social mores bring to the table—or, to the bench, as it were.

Second, it is certainly presumptuous and probably foolhardy to consider advising the Supreme Court on this matter. Nor would this be the first law review article to do so. Thus: the Court would do well to refine what “counts” in Eighth Amendment jurisprudence. The sheer variety of opinions in Baze indicates that even more limited legal questions, such as execution methods' legitimacy, engender great controversy, including about capital punishment's justification. The five-votes-to-four decision in Kennedy evidences how justices, in the aggregate, are far from clear about how the moral reasoning that its precedents require is to proceed, how expansive versus limited that reasoning should be, and of what its “own judgment” consists. Bearing disestablishment values in mind, not to mention its prescriptions, if legal scholars succeed at drafting comprehensive grammars of translation that synthesize the range of religious and non-religious moral intuitions that inform the “mores of society” regarding capital punishment, the Constitution's arbiters would have resources to better articulate how such—and which—broad moral intuitions appropriately play out in applied jurisprudence.

²⁹³ As Professor Öricü argues:

When elements from two different interpretive communities combine, one drawing its understanding from culture and the other from law for instance, they may be able to tap into each other and mesh, bringing the cultural conversation into a broader narrative. This in fact is the fit, and transpositions and creative tuning at the time of transplants are vital for this fit. If communication and conversation are kept moving, then cross-fertilization between the seemingly incompatibles can be facilitated.

Öricü, supra note 79, at 16 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

Kennedy's specifically-marked evolving standards of decency and human dignity rules are instructive,²⁹⁴ but they remain as yet controverted and convoluted. This Article's comparative model might offer one example for judicial reflection toward clarifying and developing Eighth Amendment jurisprudence.

Third, this Article has maintained that the death penalty in the United States exists against a complex historical, social, cultural, religious, moral, and legal backdrop. The Supreme Court's jurisprudence repeatedly has emphasized that this backdrop, loosely termed "the mores of society," is an integral component of its jurisprudence. But justices have disagreed over the legitimate range of sources that should be counted as evidence of such mores, and over when, and according to what criteria, their own judgment should kick in. The project just outlined for the legal academy and the judiciary can only benefit from ongoing, robust study, discussion, and advocacy by all those engaged in death penalty discourse, particularly policy advocates on all sides. As a culturally conditioned, law and morality question par excellence, death penalty jurisprudence neither does nor can exist in a vacuum, separated from the "common" jurisprudence that cultural commentators, voters, policy advocates, crime survivors and victims representatives, and offenders themselves might contribute to the conversation. To the extent that Professors Robinson and Darley are correct regarding highly nuanced yet shared moral intuitions regarding the criminal law, discourse can only advance in a fruitful manner to the extent that nuanced intuitions remain in dialogue, learning from one another and articulating cultural norms and mores useful to judicial analysis and reasoning. As this Article's study of capital punishment in Catholic teaching and U.S. jurisprudence demonstrates, both entities, as living traditions, have much to say to one another. Others do, as well.

²⁹⁴ See Kennedy, 554 U.S. at 420 (providing that "[e]volving standards of decency must embrace and express respect for the dignity of the person, and the punishment of criminals must conform to that rule."); 446 (describing "[t]he rule of evolving standards of decency with specific marks on the way to full progress and mature judgment").