State Restrictions on Candidate Access to the Ballot In Presidential Elections: Anderson v. Celebrezze

Lloyd E. Selbst

Follow this and additional works at: http://lawdigitalcommons.bc.edu/bclr

Part of the Election Law Commons

Recommended Citation
State Restrictions On Candidate Access to the Ballot In Presidential Elections: Anderson v. Celebrezze

— Article II of the United States Constitution gives the states broad authority to regulate presidential elections. It provides that "[e]ach State shall appoint in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, Equal to the Whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress..." Since the Supreme Court's landmark decision in Williams v. Rhodes, the Court has consistently held that the discretion article II gives to states to establish the rules governing national elections is limited by the first and fourteenth amendments. These amendments, in the Court's view, guarantee the right to associate for the advancement of one's political beliefs and the right to vote for a candidate of one's own political persuasion. The Court has had difficulty, however, in defining the limits that the first and fourteenth amendments place on article II's grant of authority to the states to regulate access to the presidential ballot. The Court's difficulty is apparent in the contradictory standards of review it has applied to state-imposed presidential ballot access restrictions. In one line of decisions, the Court subjected ballot access legislation to strict scrutiny by demanding that states demonstrate that the ballot access limitations at issue were the least restrictive means of serving vital state concerns. In another line of rulings, the Court required merely that the states show that the ballot access restrictions reasonably advanced legitimate state purposes.

In the recent decision of Anderson v. Celebrezze, the Supreme Court attempted to reconcile its contradictory holdings and to clarify the standard of review it will apply to ballot access restrictions on presidential candidates. In Anderson, the Court held that an early filing deadline for independent candidates is unconstitutional. The Ohio law that the Supreme Court struck down had required independent candidates to file nominating petitions with the Ohio Secretary of State seven and one-half months before the presidential election. Reasoning that the requirement interfered with the first amendment rights of voters to coalesce around candidates of their choice and to cast their votes effectively, the Court held that the early deadline impermissibly burdened independent-minded voters' rights. In striking down the Ohio statute, the Court indicated that any significant ballot access limitation by a state must be the least restrictive means available to serve an important state interest. The Court asserted that the mere existence of an important

2 U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 2.
3 393 U.S. 23 (1968) (ballot access laws which place significantly unequal burdens on independent and third party candidates violated the first amendment rights of voters to associate to advance their political views and to vote for candidates of their own political persuasion). See infra notes 43-69 and accompanying text.
5 Id.
6 See, e.g., Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. at 186-87 (see infra notes 112-15 and accompanying text); Williams v. Rhodes 393 U.S. 23, 31 (1968) (see infra notes 43-69 and accompanying text).
9 Id. at 780.
10 Id.
11 Id. at 782-83.
12 Id. at 790-91.
13 Id. at 806.
14 Id. at 794-95, 806.
state concern in a presidential election does not justify legislation to protect it. Rather, the state interest must be so vital that it requires protection even though the state restricts the voting rights of a national, and not merely a statewide or local, group of electors.

John Anderson, the plaintiff in Anderson, formally announced his candidacy for President on June 8, 1979. At that time, he sought the Republican party’s nomination. On April 24, 1980, after competing in nine primaries, Anderson declared he would campaign as an independent rather than as a Republican candidate. Anderson requested those states in which he was still scheduled to compete in a Republican primary, including Ohio, to remove his name from the primary ballot. At the same time, he sought to comply with the requirements for gaining a place on the ballot as an independent in each of those states.

On May 16, 1980, Anderson filed the nominating petition required by Ohio law. The petition was rejected by the Ohio Secretary of State because it was not filed by March 20, 1980, as required by section 3513.25.7 of the Ohio Revised Code. Three days later, Anderson and voters registered in Ohio brought suit against the Secretary of State of Ohio in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio challenging the constitutionality of the early filing deadline for independent candidates. The district court granted the petitioners’ motion for summary judgment and ordered the respondent to place Anderson’s name on the general election ballot. Ohio promptly appealed the decision and unsuccessfully sought expedited review by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court. The presidential election was held while the appeal was pending.

In other litigation, Anderson challenged early deadlines in Maine and Maryland. The United States Courts of Appeals for the First and Fourth Circuits struck down as unconstitutional state statutes with early filing deadlines similar to the Ohio requirement. The Sixth Circuit, however, upheld the Ohio early filing deadline. To resolve

15 Id. at 796.
16 Id.
18 Id.
19 Id.
20 Id.
21 Id.
22 Anderson, 460 U.S. at 782.
23 Id. at 782-83. The Ohio statute provided in pertinent part:
Each person desiring to become an independent candidate for an office for which candidates may be nominated at a primary election shall file no later than four p.m. of the seventy-fifth day before the day of the primary election immediately preceding the general election at which such candidacy is to be voted for by the voters, a statement of candidacy and nominating petition as provided in section 3513.261 (3513.26.1) of the Revised Code. . .

24 Id. at 783.
26 Anderson, 460 U.S. at 784.
27 Id.
28 Id. at 786.
29 See Anderson v. Morris, 636 F.2d 55 (4th Cir. 1980); Anderson v. Quinn, 634 F.2d 616 (1st Cir. 1980).
the conflict among the circuits caused by the Anderson cases the Supreme Court granted certiorari.31

The Supreme Court's decision in Anderson is significant because it puts forward the proposition that a state has far less an interest in a nationwide election than it has in a statewide or local election.22 The Anderson Court viewed state requirements for access to the presidential ballot as state legislation which had principally an extraterritorial effect.33
Such legislation, according to the Anderson Court, did more than burden the associational and voting rights of a single state's citizens,34 rather it placed a significant state-imposed restriction on a nationwide election process.35 The Court indicated that such state legislation is subject to a more heightened level of constitutional scrutiny than ballot access restrictions for purely intrastate elections.36 This new distinction between ballot access barriers affecting a national election and those affecting a statewide election that the Anderson Court has drawn raises significant questions that may prove extremely difficult for the Court to resolve.37

This casenote will examine the Anderson decision and its implications. The first section will examine the ballot access decisions that preceded Anderson.38 The casenote will demonstrate that in these decisions, the Court was inconsistent in the standard of review it applied.39 In addition, the casenote will show that the Court drew no distinction in these decisions between ballot access conditions which could be applied validly to national elections and those which could only be applied to state and local elections.40 The second section of the casenote will examine the Anderson decision, the new standard of review in presidential elections that the Anderson Court created and the Court's rationale for applying that standard.41 Finally, in the third section of the casenote, it will be suggested that although the Court's prior decisions on access to the ballot in presidential and other elections were inconsistent and in need of clarification, that clarification has not been sufficiently provided by the Anderson decision.42

I. THE EMERGENCE OF BALLOT ACCESS STANDARDS: WILLIAMS V. RHODES AND ITS PROGENY

Although the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that states cannot unnecessarily restrict access to the ballot, the Court has not clearly delineated what the limits are to the state's power to regulate elections.43 In 1968, in Williams v. Rhodes,44 the Supreme Court held unconstitutional for the first time a state law limiting access of independent and third

---

32 460 U.S. at 795.
33 Id.
34 Id.
35 Id.
36 Id.
37 See infra notes 287-308 and accompanying text.
38 See infra notes 44-133 and accompanying text.
39 See infra notes 74-133 and accompanying text.
40 See infra notes 136-40 and accompanying text.
41 See infra notes 141-210 and accompanying text.
42 See infra notes 237-308 and accompanying text.
44 393 U.S. 23 (1968).
party candidates to the general election ballot. The statute at issue in Williams regulated ballot access for presidential candidates. Although the holding was therefore limited to presidential elections, the language of the decision indicated that the Court would apply the standards it enunciated in its decision to other elections as well. Indeed, subsequent Court rulings have used Williams as authority for the proposition that a state's ability to restrict ballot access for any elective public office is limited by the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment. The Ohio law challenged in Williams required new and small political parties, as well as the two major parties, to hold primary elections for presidential electors on a statewide basis. This statute mandated an elaborate party election apparatus to organize the primary and also required candidates in the primaries to file nominating petitions signed by "qualified electors." The law defined a qualified elector as one who voted for a majority of that party's candidates in the last election or had never voted in any election before. In examining the state law, the Court determined that Ohio's numerous and burdensome requirements made it "virtually impossible" for a new political party, or an old political party with a very small number of members, to be placed on the presidential ballot. The Court also noted that the Ohio law made no provision whatsoever for ballot positions for independent candidates.

Reasoning that the authority article II grants to the states to control the selection of presidential electors may not be exercised in violation of other constitutional provisions, the Court rejected Ohio's contention that the state had absolute power to establish any barriers it chose to the presidential ballot. One limitation on the states' authority to control the choice of presidential electors, the Court held, is the equal protection clause. The Court asserted that the equal protection clause does not forbid minor differences in the treatment of candidates. According to the Court, the equal protection clause does, however, prohibit state laws which impose unequal burdens on candidates, unless justified by a compelling state interest.

In finding that the Ohio statute violated the equal protection clause, the Court asserted that Ohio's ballot access law burdened the first amendment rights of voters to associate and to vote which are shielded from unequal restriction by the states through the equal protection clause. According to the Williams Court, the conditions on ballot access that the Ohio law placed on minor party candidates and independents were significantly

---

46 393 U.S. 23, 28 (1968).

47 See, e.g., Storer, 415 U.S. at 730; Bullock v. Carter, 405 U.S. at 141; Jenness v. Fortson, 403 U.S. at 441.

48 Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. at 28.

49 Id. at 25.

50 Id.

51 Id.

52 Id.

53 Id. at 26.

54 Id. at 29. See text accompanying note 2 for the text of the relevant portion of article II.

55 Id. at 28-29.

56 Id.

57 U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 1.

58 Williams, 393 U.S. at 30.

59 Id. at 31.

60 Id. at 34.
greater than the conditions the law placed on Republican and Democratic candidates.\textsuperscript{61} The Court ruled that such requirements burdened the first amendment rights of supporters of minor party and independent candidates and could only be justified by a compelling state interest.\textsuperscript{62} Ohio, the Court found, advanced no interest sufficiently important to justify the requirements.\textsuperscript{63}

In holding that state access to ballot laws are subject to strict scrutiny, the \textit{Williams} decision reversed a line of Supreme Court decisions holding that state laws on access to the ballot had only to pass the rational relationship test.\textsuperscript{64} Under the rational relationship test, the Court would not look at the effects of the challenged legislation but only at whether the state's purpose in passing the law was discriminatory.\textsuperscript{65} By subjecting ballot access legislation to stringent review,\textsuperscript{66} the \textit{Williams} Court required the states to demonstrate that a law significantly limiting access to the ballot is justified by a compelling state interest and that the state law is the least burdensome alternative for promoting that interest.\textsuperscript{67} The \textit{Williams} Court did not, however, specify what kinds of state ballot access laws would withstand constitutional scrutiny. It merely stated that the equal protection clause forbids states to provide positions only for Democrats and Republicans while other candidates "are clamoring for a place on the ballot."\textsuperscript{68} Indeed, in his dissent to the \textit{Williams} decision, Chief Justice Warren's principal criticism was that the Court provided no concrete guidelines to the states specifying which ballot access laws could pass the Court's scrutiny.\textsuperscript{69}

Supreme Court decisions subsequent to \textit{Williams} have also failed to provide guidelines to the states on the limitations of their power to regulate access to the ballot. The Court has stated that it can not provide a "litmus paper test" to separate valid from invalid ballot access laws\textsuperscript{70} and has emphasized that decisions in this context must be "very much a matter of degree."\textsuperscript{71} In general, the decisions are limited to assessing whether the precise law in question imposes unequal burdens on voters.\textsuperscript{72} The Court has carefully avoided making rulings which could lend themselves to generalization.\textsuperscript{73}

The Court's lack of clarity in deciding state access to ballot cases is evident from its contradictory rulings on the central question of what standard of review to apply in such

---

\textsuperscript{61} Id. at 32.
\textsuperscript{62} Id. at 31.
\textsuperscript{63} Id.
\textsuperscript{64} \textit{See}, e.g., \textit{MacDougal v. Green}, 335 U.S. 281, 283-84 (1948) (per curiam); \textit{Snowden v. Hughes}, 321 U.S. 1, 7-10 (1943).
\textsuperscript{65} \textit{See supra} notes 45-63 and accompanying text.
\textsuperscript{66} \textit{Williams}, 393 U.S. at 32. \textit{See also Socialist Workers Party}, 440 U.S. at 185.
\textsuperscript{67} \textit{Williams}, 393 U.S. at 31.
\textsuperscript{68} Id. at 69-70 (Warren, C.J., dissenting).
\textsuperscript{69} \textit{Decision in this context, as in others, is very much 'a matter of degree'... very much a matter of 'consider[ing] the facts and circumstances behind the law, the interests which the state claims to be protecting, and the interests of those who are disadvantaged by the classification.' }\textit{Storer}, 415 U.S. at 730 (citations omitted).
\textsuperscript{71} \textit{See infra} notes 50-72 and accompanying text.
cases. In some cases, the Court has indicated that states have substantial discretion in regulating the election process. In others, the Court has held that a state may restrict access to the ballot only to protect a vital interest, using the least restrictive means which will serve that interest. For example, in the two ballot access cases decided immediately after Williams, the Supreme Court seemed to retreat from its insistence in Williams that courts must apply a rigorous standard of review to ballot access legislation. In Jenness v. Fortson, the Court upheld a Georgia statute requiring demonstration of support for candidates for elective office. The Court reasoned that the legislation furthered the important state interest of "avoiding confusion of the democratic process . . . ." The Court, however, did not characterize the interest Georgia sought to protect as "compelling" or "vital" as it normally does when applying strict scrutiny. Furthermore, the Court did not discuss whether Georgia had used the least restrictive alternative available for promoting its interest.

The Jenness Court did not specify its standard of scrutiny. It does not appear, however, that the Court could have used the heightened review that the Williams Court applied. To be consistent with Williams, the Jenness Court should have ruled that the state had shown that its demonstration of support requirement was the least restrictive means available to further an urgent state concern. The decision gives no evidence that Georgia was required to show that its law advanced an urgent state interest. On the contrary, the Court's observation that some states had established lower demonstration of support requirements than Georgia had enacted indicates that the Jenness Court used a standard which fell short of strict scrutiny.

Bullock v. Carter is another Supreme Court decision that appears to be inconsistent with the Williams decision. In Bullock, the Court struck down a Texas law requiring payment of a substantial filing fee as an absolute prerequisite to securing a line on the ballot. The Court noted that Texas had a legitimate interest in limiting ballot access to avoid clogging the election machinery. In holding that the challenged legislation did not serve that interest, the Court rejected the state's argument that a high filing fee limited the ballot to serious candidates and was therefore a rational means of forwarding the state's concern. The Court reasoned that no logical connection existed between the ability of a candidate and his supporters to pay a substantial fee and the seriousness of his candidacy. In the Court's view, the Texas statute impermissibly restricted voters' first 71 See, e.g., Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. at 970 (Rehnquist, J., plurality opinion); American Party of Texas, 415 U.S. at 780.

---

72 See, e.g., Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. at 185.
74 403 U.S. 431, 442 (1971) (in order to have a ballot position, under a Georgia law, nominees of small political parties and independent candidates were required to have nominating petitions signed by 5 percent of those eligible to vote in the last election for the office sought).
75 Id. at 442.
76 Id.
77 Id.
79 Id. at 145.
amendment rights to associate and to vote by limiting the range of candidates on the ballot from which voters might choose by a wholly arbitrary means.\(^7\)

In Bullock, the Court stated that it closely scrutinized the challenged statute.\(^8\) But, in striking down the statute, the Court did not state that it rejected the measure because it was not the least burdensome alternative. The Court indicated merely that the provision failed because it was unreasonable.\(^9\) The level of review that the Court used in Bullock seems to be comparable, therefore, to the level of review that the Court used in Jenness. In Jenness, the Court appears to have applied something less than strict scrutiny by ruling that the challenged statute was valid because it furthered an important state interest without finding that the interest advanced was "vital," "urgent," or "compelling" as the Court normally does to signal that it has strictly scrutinized a statute.\(^10\) Further, the Jenness Court does not seem to have required that the means chosen by the state be the least restrictive alternative.\(^11\) Similarly, in Bullock, the Court indicated that the interest that the state intended to advance by its ballot access law could be merely legitimate and that the means that the state has used must be reasonable.\(^12\)

In the companion cases of American Party of Texas v. White\(^13\) and Storer v. Brown,\(^14\) the Supreme Court seems to have recognized that Williams, Jenness, and Bullock were contradictory and attempted to reconcile them by establishing a mixed standard of review.\(^15\) The Court suggested, in both American Party and Storer, that a state must show that the legislation in question protects a vital state interest.\(^16\) The Court did not, however, demand that the state use the least restrictive alternative to protect the interest.\(^17\)

In American Party, the Court upheld a complex Texas statute which provided four methods for nominating candidates to the general election ballot.\(^18\) Two small parties challenged the provision of the statute requiring candidates of parties of small size to qualify for ballot position either through nominating conventions or by securing the required number of signatures on nominating petitions.\(^19\) In addition, independent candidates challenged the nominating petition requirement which applied to them.\(^20\) The Court held that the validity of the challenged qualifications depended on whether they were necessary to advance compelling state interests.\(^21\) The Court found that the legislation was enacted to serve vital state concerns, that is, preserving the integrity of the ballot process and regulating the number of candidates on the ballot to avoid voter

---

\(^7\) Id. at 149.

\(^8\) Id. at 143-44.

\(^9\) Id. at 146-47. See also Note, A New Dimension, supra note 45, at 1307-10 (neither Jenness nor Bullock used stringent review).

\(^11\) See supra note 80 and accompanying text.

\(^12\) 405 U.S. 134, 146-47 (1972).

\(^15\) Storer v. Brown and American Party v. White attempted the synthesis . . . . The standard of review actually applied . . . seems to have been a mix of strict and minimal scrutiny." L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 782-83 (1978) [hereinafter cited as L. Tribe].

\(^17\) 415 U.S. at 780; 415 U.S. at 736.

\(^18\) American Party of Texas v. White, 415 U.S. at 772.

\(^19\) Id. at 776.

\(^20\) Id. at 788.

\(^21\) Id. at 780.
confusion. 102 In addition, the Court found that the state's objectives could not have been met by significantly less burdensome measures. 103 This finding was, however, a bald, unsubstantiated assertion by the Court. 104 Justice Douglas, in his dissent, maintained that some of the statute's provisions were unnecessarily limiting, such as the requirements that independent candidates had merely a thirty day period in which to gather signatures on their nominating petitions and that voters could sign the petition of only one candidate. 105 The majority did not address Justice Douglas' observations. 106

In Storer v. Brown, the Court upheld the constitutionality of a state law requiring candidates desiring positions on the ballot as independents to disaffiliate themselves from all parties one year before the election. 107 The Court stated that the requirement was essential to protect California's compelling interest in avoiding intraparty feuding in election years. 108 The Court does not seem to have inquired into the possibility of a less restrictive alternative. 109 Neither Storer nor American Party, therefore, appear to apply the strict scrutiny test of Williams. In both cases the Court required the presence of a vital state interest to justify state imposed ballot access legislation. 110 Neither case seems to have required the states to demonstrate that the challenged statutes were the least burdensome means to protect the asserted interest. 111

In its next major ballot access decision, Illinois State Board of Election v. Socialist Workers Party, 112 the Court again seemed to have changed its standard of review. The challenged Illinois statute contained a provision requiring candidates seeking ballot positions for office in Chicago to secure more signatures on nominating petitions than candidates for statewide office. 113 The Supreme Court held that the Illinois law was unconstitutional because it was not the least burdensome means to achieve the state's objective of providing ballot positions only for candidates who had a reasonable degree of support. 114 In this decision, the Court grounded its ruling on the existence of less restrictive alternatives. 115 In American Party and Storer, in contrast, the Court made no inquiry into the possible existence of less restrictive means of serving the interests asserted by the states. 116

In Clements v. Fashing, 117 the last major Supreme Court decision on ballot access prior to Anderson, the Court appeared to have abandoned the position it had just taken in Illinois Board of Elections. 118 In Clements, the Court upheld a Texas law barring state, federal, and foreign office holders from campaigning for a seat in the Texas legislature if the terms of their present offices overlapped the legislative term for which they sought election. 119 The

102 Id.
103 Id. at 781.
104 Id.
105 Id. at 797-98 (Douglas, J. dissenting).
106 Id. at 781.
108 Id.
109 Id. at 761 (Brennan, J. dissenting).
110 See supra note 96 and accompanying text.
111 See supra note 97 and accompanying text.
113 Id. at 186.
114 Id. at 186-87.
115 Id.
116 See supra notes 96-97 and accompanying text.
118 See supra note 114 and accompanying text.
Court split evenly on the appropriate level of scrutiny. The plurality asserted that the equal protection clause generally does not require heightened scrutiny of ballot access legislation or any other restriction on the right to candidacy.\textsuperscript{120} It argued that close scrutiny is required only when the law discriminates on the basis of wealth or a suspect classification, or substantially disadvantaged third party and independent candidacies.\textsuperscript{121} Because the Texas law involved neither suspect classifications nor allegedly unequal burdens on minor party or independent candidates, the plurality claimed that close scrutiny was not applicable and that the rational relationship test provided the appropriate level of review.\textsuperscript{122} According to the plurality, because the only complainants were Texas Justices of the Peace, the sole issues in the case were whether Texas had a legitimate interest in prohibiting candidates for the legislature from holding a paid state office during their campaigns and whether the "resign to run" provision reasonably served that interest.\textsuperscript{123} The plurality held that Texas' interest in preventing state officeholders from neglecting their duties while they sought other state positions was valid and that the law was rationally related to that concern.\textsuperscript{124}

The dissent in \textit{Clements} argued that \textit{Williams v. Rhodes} and its progeny had established that the Court must apply strict scrutiny to ballot access legislation and to any other significant restriction on the right to candidacy.\textsuperscript{125} Prior decisions such as \textit{Storer v. Brown} and \textit{Bullock v. Carter}, the dissent asserted, did not use strict scrutiny merely when, as the plurality claimed, challenged ballot access legislation discriminated on the basis of suspect categories or imposed burdens on new or small political parties or on independent candidates.\textsuperscript{126} Rather, the dissent maintained, "strict scrutiny was required in those [ballot access] cases because of their impact on the First Amendment rights of candidates and voters."\textsuperscript{127} According to the dissent, the Texas "resign to run" statute had the same effect of reducing the field of candidates as did overly restrictive ballot access legislation.\textsuperscript{128} It was subject therefore, the dissent maintained, to the same stringent level of review as ballot access statutes that discriminated against minority voters, candidates or parties.\textsuperscript{129} The dissent concluded that the Texas law could not survive strict scrutiny\textsuperscript{130} because Texas could not possibly have a vital interest in demanding that officeholders resign from federal or foreign offices before running for the Texas legislature.\textsuperscript{131} Further, the dissent maintained that the law was not sufficiently tailored to its goal.\textsuperscript{132} In the dissent's view, the statute was so overly broad in its application to officeholders outside the state of Texas that it did not pass the rational relationship test, much less the strict scrutiny that the \textit{Williams} line of cases required the Court to apply to any state legislation designed to keep a significant number of candidates from running for office or from appearing on the ballot.\textsuperscript{133}

\begin{footnotesize}
\textsuperscript{120} \textit{Id.} at 965-66.  \\
\textsuperscript{121} \textit{Id.} at 964-65.  \\
\textsuperscript{122} \textit{Id.} at 966-70.  \\
\textsuperscript{123} \textit{Id.} at 966-68.  \\
\textsuperscript{124} \textit{Id.} at 968-69.  \\
\textsuperscript{125} \textit{Id.} at 977 n.2 (Brennan, J., dissenting).  \\
\textsuperscript{126} \textit{Id.}  \\
\textsuperscript{127} \textit{Id.}  \\
\textsuperscript{128} \textit{Id.}  \\
\textsuperscript{129} \textit{Id.}  \\
\textsuperscript{130} \textit{Id.} at 980-84 (Brennan, J., dissenting).  \\
\textsuperscript{131} \textit{Id.} at 978-79 (Brennan, J., dissenting).  \\
\textsuperscript{132} \textit{Id.} at 978-80 (Brennan, J., dissenting).  \\
\textsuperscript{133} 460 U.S. 780 (1983).  \\
\end{footnotesize}
Anderson v. Celebrezze is the Court's latest attempt to clarify the states' authority to limit access to the ballot, at least as regards presidential elections. In Anderson, the Court attempted to specify what states can and cannot do to regulate ballot access in national campaigns. As prior decisions generally asserted, this decision specifies that states must have a strong interest and must design a precisely drawn statute to have a valid ballot access law. In contrast to prior decisions, however, the Anderson Court held for the first time that close review must be applied with particular rigor to statutes limiting ballot access for presidential candidates because states do not have as strong an interest in regulating national elections as they do in regulating intrastate elections. Several years earlier, in Cousins v. Wigoda, the Court held that a state's interest in a party's presidential nominating convention was too slight to allow the state to establish rules for the seating of delegates. The Anderson decision extends the holding in Cousins to presidential elections.

II. Anderson v. Celebrezze

A. The Majority Opinion

Justice Stevens, writing for the majority in Anderson, began the analysis of the case with a general discussion of the states' power to legislate conditions for ballot positions. The Court observed first that its primary concern in assessing the constitutionality of ballot access laws was examining the impact such laws have on voters because of a tendency to limit the field from which voters might choose. The Court pointed out that ballot position requirements restricted two basic constitutional rights of voters — the right to associate for the advancement of one's political beliefs and the right to vote for a candidate of one's own political persuasion. Both rights, the Court stated, "rank among our most precious freedoms." Recognizing that, as a practical matter, the states must have substantial authority to regulate elections so that they can impose order on them, the Court stated that the constitutionality of those regulations depended on the interests the state put forward as justification and the burden those interests imposed on voters' constitutionally protected liberties.

The Court explained further that the validity of ballot access legislation could be measured by the extent to which the statute placed unequal burdens on voters' first amendment rights. This approach, the Court noted, was used in earlier ballot access

---

134 See infra notes 141-210 and accompanying text.
136 Id. at 794-95.
137 Id. at 795.
139 Id. at 478-79, 489-90.
140 Anderson, 460 U.S. at 794-95.
141 Id. at 786. The opinion was joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justices Brennan, Marshall and Blackmun. Justice Rehnquist wrote the dissenting opinion and was joined by Justices White, Powell and O'Connor.
142 Id.
143 Id. at 787 (quoting Williams, 393 U.S. at 30-31).
144 Id.
145 Id. at 788 (quoting Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. at 730).
146 Id. at 789.
147 Id. at 786-87 n.7.
The Court maintained, however, that the constitutionality of a ballot access restriction could be gauged simply by ascertaining the degree to which the statute limited voters' first amendment rights without reference to equal protection requirements. The Court stated that it would follow the latter course in reviewing the Anderson case.

In addressing the impact of early filing deadlines on voters and candidates, the Court pointed out that state-imposed early deadlines for independent candidates placed significant burdens on voters' first amendment rights. The Court observed that the impact was particularly strong when, as in the present case, early deadlines were applied to elections for national office. In national elections, the Court stated, candidates rapidly rise and fall in popularity and new issues emerge as a result of national and international developments. These changes, the Court reasoned, affect declared candidates' strategies and create opportunities for new candidates. The Court noted that Ohio's filing deadline prevented persons wishing to be independent candidates from entering the presidential contest in the Ohio arena after the middle of March. At that time, the Court stressed, developments in the campaigns for major party nominations had hardly begun. The Court emphasized that the Republican and Democratic choices of candidates and platforms still lay five months in the future. Under the Ohio law, the Court noted, an independent had the significant problem of deciding whether to challenge the major political parties before he could possibly know what their candidates or platforms would be. Furthermore, according to the Court, newly emergent independent candidates traditionally served as focal points for voters who become disaffected with the major party choices. Independents could not play this important role, the Court asserted, if they could not secure places on the ballot. The Court reasoned that, as a practical matter, late-emerging candidates would be barred from running effectively in Ohio however important their candidacies might prove to voters in other states. Moreover, the Court stated, not only would a deadline as early as Ohio's exclude from the election process an independent candidate who decided to run after the middle of March, but also it would burden even those independents who decided to run in time to meet the deadline because it would hinder their ability to garner the requisite number of signatures on their nominating petitions. When the Republican and Democratic primaries are so far in the future, the Court found, volunteers are difficult to recruit, media coverage is hard to

---

149 Id.

150 Id.

151 Id. at 790.

152 Id.

153 Id.

154 Id.

155 Id.

156 Id. at 790-91.

157 Id. at 791.

158 Id.

159 Id. at 791-92.

160 Id. at 787, 799 n.26.

161 Id. at 792.

162 Id.
come by, and, therefore, voters are generally unaware of candidates and issues and are extremely reluctant to support independents.163

The Court stated that the constitutionality of a state-imposed early deadline must depend on the urgency of the state interest that the deadline was enacted to protect.164 Because Ohio's legislation substantially limited the constitutionally protected liberties of candidates and voters, the Court continued, the benefits that Ohio claimed it derived from the law were subject to careful scrutiny.165 The Court emphasized that because Ohio's law was directed at aspirants for the presidency,166 the state-imposed restrictions implicated a "uniquely important national interest" in the election.167 This national interest, according to the Court, far outweighed the state's own interest.168 Thus, the Court analyzed the constitutionality of Ohio's deadline in light of the relatively slight interest Ohio had in a presidential campaign.169 To support this conclusion the Court pointed out that in Cousins v. Wigoda170 it had struck down a state law regulating the selection of delegates to a presidential nominating convention because the national interest in the selection of party candidates for national office was greater than the interest of any individual state.171 In Anderson, the Court stressed that the national interest in presidential elections similarly dwarfed the interest of the state.172 The Court reasoned that the president and vice president are the sole office holders chosen by voters in all states and that the votes for presidential and vice-presidential candidates cast in each state affect the votes cast in other states.173 According to the Court, stringent state ballot access requirements which exclude a presidential candidate from a state's ballot dilute the value of votes cast for that candidate beyond that state's borders.174

Based on this analysis, the Court concluded that Ohio's early deadline burdened the rights of candidates and voters in states other than Ohio and significantly restricted the national election process.175 The state of Ohio, the Court pointed out, had identified three vital interests it sought to serve by its early filing deadline: voter education, equal treatment for partisan and independent candidates, and political stability.176 To determine whether the three interests identified by the state of Ohio justified the significant burdens the Ohio ballot access restrictions imposed on the presidential election process, the Court next examined each of these interests in detail.177

In addressing Ohio's interest in voter education, the Court observed that the state unquestionably had a legitimate interest in insuring the existence of an informed electorate.178 The Court was not persuaded, however, that such an interest justified a March filing deadline for independent candidates in a presidential election and rejected Ohio's assertions that an early filing requirement assured the electorate adequate time to observe candidates and to inform itself about them. Because the media in modern times could communicate information about candidates instantaneously, the Court reasoned that the length of time a candidate was exposed to the state electorate could no longer be a very significant factor in voter education. The Court determined that rapid dissemination of information on candidates' positions and backgrounds was especially true in a presidential election due to the intense publicity presidential candidates receive. Limiting the number of ballot positions by an early deadline, the Court maintained, reduced the field of candidates in an election because it deprived some candidates of their incentive to run. Early deadlines, in the Court's view, quite possibly restricted rather than increased the flow of information about political aspirants and issues in an election. Thus, the Court was not persuaded that Ohio's early filing requirement advanced the state's interest in voter education to any significant degree.

Second, the Court found no merit in Ohio's claim that an early deadline served the state's interest in treating all candidates alike. According to the Court, although the deadline applied to all candidates, its effect was not the same for all. The consequences of not meeting the deadline were entirely different for Republican and Democratic primary participants, for example, than for independent candidates. Major party candidates, the Court pointed out, could have their names entered on the Ohio ballot even if they did not decide, prior to the deadline, to run in Ohio. An independent, however, was denied a position on the Ohio ballot if he did not declare his candidacy before March 20. Furthermore, the Court reasoned that a national party candidate had something to gain if he chose to file before the deadline in Ohio. Early filing gave such a candidate the opportunity to run in the Ohio primary and win delegates to his party's convention. The deadline, however, could not benefit the independent because he did not participate in a structured intraparty contest. A common March deadline was, therefore, according to the Court, not equal treatment of independent and partisan candidates. The deadline did not burden party candidates and independents equally.

Lastly, the Court analyzed Ohio's claim that it had a substantial interest in protecting the two major political parties from damaging "intraparty feuding." According to the Court, Ohio claimed that a candidate's decision to abandon his efforts to secure a major party's nomination shortly before an election and to run instead as an independent, could

---

179 Id.
180 Id. at 796-97.
181 Id. at 797.
182 Id. at 798.
183 Id. at 787, 788 n.8.
184 Id. at 798.
185 Id.
186 Id. at 799.
187 Id.
188 Id.
189 Id.
190 Id.
191 Id. at 800.
192 Id.
193 Id.
194 Id. at 800-01.
195 Id. at 801.
196 Id.
draw an excessive amount of support away from the principal parties, thereby threatening the state's political party structure. The Court reasoned that Ohio's assertion amounted to a desire to protect the Republicans and Democrats from the competition of former members for volunteers and other campaign resources.

Recognizing that it had determined that preventing intraparty feuding could indeed be a legitimate state interest in Storer v. Brown, the Court distinguished the statute in that decision from the Ohio statute in question. The statute involved in Storer, the Court observed, was a statute that governed an intrastate election, whereas the statute challenged in Anderson affected national elections. In Storer, the Court stated, it had upheld a California law which required an independent candidate to disaffiliate himself from all political parties one year before the election in which he sought state office. According to the Anderson Court, Ohio's early deadline for independents did not serve the same function as the California law. The Court maintained that Ohio had a separate measure designed to discourage independent candidacies by disappointed aspirants for a party's nomination. The Court noted Ohio's deadline applied to all independents regardless of whether they had sought a party's nomination for the same election. The Ohio deadline, the Court determined, was not a disaffiliation requirement as was California's law. In addition, the Court stated, Ohio did not have as much interest in regulating a national election as it would in regulating a state election. Consequently, any reduction in intraparty feuding that the deadline might produce in Ohio was outweighed by its burdens on a national electorate.

After examining each of the state interests, the Court found that the Ohio statute did not significantly serve those interests. To the extent the statute had any positive effect at all, the Court concluded, it furthered state interests which were minimal, given the nationwide scope of the election.

B. The Dissenting Opinion

Justice Rehnquist, in a dissenting opinion, took issue with the majority's use of strict scrutiny as the standard of review for a state imposed ballot access law. He argued that article II of the Constitution expressly granted the states plenary power to choose presidential electors. According to Justice Rehnquist, the only limits on the state's

---

197 Id.
198 Id.
199 Id.
200 "In Storer we recognized the legitimacy of the State's interest in preventing 'splintering parties and unrestrained factionalism.'" Id. at 803 (quoting Storer, 415 U.S. at 736).
201 Id. at 804.
202 Id. at 803.
203 Id. at 804.
204 Id. at 804 n.7.
205 Id. at 805.
206 Id. at 804.
207 Id.
208 Id. at 805-06.
209 Id. at 806.
210 Id.
211 Id. at 806-23 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting). The dissent was joined by Justices White, Powell and O'Connor.
212 Id. at 806 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
power to restrict ballot access concerned rules denying the vote to citizens on arbitrary and discriminatory grounds and laws making it virtually impossible for third party and independent candidates to secure places on the ballot.213 Within these parameters, Justice Rehnquist argued, the Court has allowed the states to enact any legislation "tied to a particularized legitimate purpose."214

The majority, Justice Rehnquist maintained, misinterpreted the holdings of previous ballot access cases like Storer v. Brown.215 These decisions, Rehnquist maintained, "never required the states to meet some kind of narrowly tailored standard in order to pass constitutional muster."216 Justice Rehnquist implied that the federal judiciary was not empowered to subject a state's interest to stringent examination, as the Anderson majority did.217 He also implied that precedent did not require that a state's legislation regarding elections use the least restrictive alternative for serving a vital state interest.218

Justice Rehnquist maintained that the law challenged in Anderson met all relevant criteria for the rational relationship test that he argued the Court should apply.219 First, he stated that Ohio clearly had a legitimate interest in voter education in presidential elections.220 Second, unlike the majority, Justice Rehnquist found that Ohio's early deadline significantly furthered this interest.221 He asserted that the rapid methods of communication in contemporary life had not obviated the importance of the length of time a candidate is before the voters in a state.222

Justice Rehnquist conceded that the majority was correct in pointing out that Ohio's law made it almost impossible for Anderson to test the waters adequately as a party hopeful and then secure a line on the ballot as an independent when it was clear he would lose in a primary.223 He argued, however, that nothing in prior ballot access decisions on

[213] Id. at 808, 812 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
[214] Id. at 812 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting). Justice Rehnquist's rationale in Anderson was somewhat unclear. He apparently saw Anderson as primarily an equal protection case and attempted to make the same points in his dissent that he made in his plurality opinion in Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. 957 (1982). In Clements, Justice Rehnquist argued that under the normal level of equal protection review a statute's "distinctions need only be drawn in such a manner as to bear some rational relationship to a legitimate end." Id. at 962-63. In Clements, Justice Rehnquist asserted that the Court had abandoned the rational relationship test for close scrutiny review in ballot access cases when the challenged laws involved classifications based on wealth or imposed burdens on new or small parties or independent candidates. Id. at 964-65. Justice Rehnquist implied that this standard of review was consistent with the Court's application of equal protection analysis to other statutes. Id. at 962-63. The Court, Justice Rehnquist claimed, had departed from traditional equal protection principles only when the challenged statute placed burdens on "suspect" classifications or "fundamental" rights. Id.
[216] 406 U.S. at 817 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
[217] Id.
[218] Id.
[219] Id. at 818 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
[220] Id. at 818-19 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
[221] Id.
[222] Id. According to Justice Rehnquist, Ohio's assertion that an early deadline gave voters as much time as possible to gather information about candidates and to examine how well they withstood the rigors of a campaign was reasonable. In Justice Rehnquist's view the Court should have deferred to the Ohio legislature in this matter. Id.
[223] "Quite clearly rather than prohibiting him from seeking the Presidency, the filing deadline only prevented him from having two shots at it in the same election year." Id. at 811-12 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
presidential or other elections forbade that kind of limitation on candidates.\footnote{224} Indeed, in Rehnquist's view, precisely the same kind of law, in an intrastate context, had been upheld in \textit{Storer v. Brown}.\footnote{225} The dissent interpreted the holding in \textit{Storer} to be that reasonable disaffiliation statutes are within a state's discretion.\footnote{226} Justice Rehnquist maintained that the majority did not convincingly distinguish \textit{Anderson} from \textit{Storer},\footnote{227} arguing that Ohio did not have a less substantial interest in avoiding party fragmentation in national than in intrastate elections as the majority claimed.\footnote{228} Thus, based on \textit{Storer} and other precedent Justice Rehnquist and the other dissenters would have upheld Ohio's early deadline for independents.\footnote{229}

The dissent stands in sharp contrast to the view of the \textit{Anderson} majority. The dissenting Justices argued that, based on article II of the Constitution and on Supreme Court precedents, state ballot access laws must normally meet the rational relationship test rather than the strict scrutiny test.\footnote{230} Strict scrutiny, according to the dissent, is applicable only if the challenged statute denies the vote to citizens on arbitrary and discriminatory grounds or severely restricts the ability of independent and third party candidates to secure ballot positions.\footnote{231} Ohio's early deadline, the dissent maintained, met none of the criteria necessary to trigger the Court's use of strict scrutiny.\footnote{232} The \textit{Anderson} majority, however, found that the Court must apply strict scrutiny to any law significantly limiting candidate access to the ballot.\footnote{233} Reasoning that states have less of an interest in regulating ballot access in national elections than in intrastate elections, the majority also ruled that state laws regulating ballot access for presidential and vice-presidential candidates must meet a more stringent level of strict scrutiny than laws restricting ballot access for other offices.\footnote{234} In the majority's view, Ohio did not assert a sufficiently compelling interest to justify its early filing deadline for independent presidential candidates to meet the requirements of the heightened strict scrutiny the Court was obliged to apply.\footnote{235} The next section of the casenote will explore the importance of the \textit{Anderson} decision and the questions that the Court's new position on ballot access laws raise.

\section*{III. The Anderson Decision in Perspective}

The \textit{Anderson} decision is significant because it establishes that ballot access legislation is subject to strict review by the judiciary and because the Court declared that states do not have as significant an interest in regulating national elections as they have in controlling state elections.\footnote{236} This section of the casenote will demonstrate that \textit{Anderson} indicates the presence of a stable majority for the use of heightened review of ballot access legisla-

\begin{itemize}
\item \footnote{221} "This is precisely the same behavior that California sought to prevent by the disaffiliation statute (this Court upheld in \textit{Storer})." \textit{Id.} at 814 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\item \footnote{222} \textit{Id.} at 812-14 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\item \footnote{226} \textit{Id.} at 814 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\item \footnote{227} \textit{Id.}
\item \footnote{228} \textit{Id.} at 815 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\item \footnote{229} \textit{Id.} at 817 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\item \footnote{230} \textit{Id.} at 818 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\item \footnote{231} \textit{Id.} at 812 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\item \footnote{232} \textit{Id.} at 818 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\item \footnote{233} \textit{Id.} at 786-87, 806.
\item \footnote{234} \textit{Id.} at 789, 795.
\item \footnote{235} \textit{Id.} at 806.
\item \footnote{236} \textit{Id.} at 789, 795.
\end{itemize}
tion. 237 Additionally, this section will suggest that Anderson simplifies challenges to ballot access laws by establishing that suit can be brought solely on the basis of a statute's limitation of first amendment rights. 238 Equal protection analysis no longer seems to be necessary. 239 This section will then point out that Anderson was essentially consistent with the policy goals of most of the Court's earlier ballot access decisions. 240 It is suggested that the dissent's approach to ballot access analysis was far less consistent with precedent. 241 The casenote will argue, however, that the dissent was correct in asserting that the majority's use of a particularly strict standard of scrutiny for ballot access limitations on national candidates was a departure from past practice. 242 Finally, this casenote will propose that the distinction Anderson made between national and intrastate elections will not make it easier for courts to gauge the constitutionality of ballot access laws. 243 Indeed, it seems to make ballot access analysis even more difficult.

A. The Significance of Anderson

Supreme Court decisions have not been consistent in addressing the states' power to regulate access to the ballot. 244 Some decisions have subjected ballot access legislation to strict scrutiny, asserting that states must have a vital state interest to protect and must use the least burdensome alternative for furthering that interest to have a valid ballot access law. 245 Other rulings have applied a mixed standard of review, demanding that the state demonstrate that its statute protects a compelling state interest, but not demanding that the state use the least restrictive means to promote that interest. 246 One decision held that ballot access legislation must merely be rationally related to a legitimate state purpose unless the law discriminates against suspect categories or limits access to the ballot by independent or third party candidates. 247 The Anderson decision specified that strict scrutiny was the appropriate level of review of state imposed ballot access limitations. 248 By calling for stringent review in ballot access decisions, the Anderson case seems to settle the debate on the applicable level of scrutiny. 249 Significantly, the Anderson majority was composed of Justice Stevens and the four dissenting justices in Clements v. Fashing, who had argued that significant ballot access legislation must always receive close scrutiny by the courts. 250 The plurality in Clements had maintained that ballot access statutes are subject to strict scrutiny only if the laws discriminate on the basis of a suspect category or substantially disadvantage independent and third party candidates. 251 Justice Stevens, in Clements, voted with the plurality but rejected both

237 See infra notes 248-53 and accompanying text.
238 See infra notes 254-60 and accompanying text.
239 Id.
240 See infra notes 261-70 and accompanying text.
241 See infra notes 271-78 and accompanying text.
242 See infra notes 279-86 and accompanying text.
243 See infra notes 289-308 and accompanying text.
244 See supra notes 44-133 and accompanying text.
245 See, e.g., Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. at 185; Williams, 393 U.S. at 31-33.
See also L. Tribe, supra note 95, at 782-83.
247 Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. at 962-65 (Rehnquist, J., plurality opinion).
249 Id.
250 Id. at 781. See also Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. at 976 (Rehnquist, J., plurality opinion).
251 Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. at 976 (Rehnquist, J., plurality opinion).
the plurality's and dissent's interpretations of the appropriate level of review. In Anderson, Justice Stevens fully adopted the strict scrutiny views of the Clements dissenters. It would seem that, for the present time at least, the Court has reached a stable majority on the issue of the level of scrutiny ballot access laws must receive.

In addition to settling the level of scrutiny to be accorded ballot access legislation, the Anderson decision has facilitated challenges to ballot access laws by the supporters of independent and third party candidates. The Court in Anderson did not rely on equal protection analysis, even though it recognized that equal protection analysis was used in its prior decisions. The Anderson Court based its argument solely on the first and fourteenth amendments, viewing Ohio's March filing deadline for independents only as a restriction on Anderson's supporters' rights to vote and to associate. It appears that the new majority, by specifically ruling that challenges to ballot access restrictions can be based solely on first amendment rights, has attempted to ease the burden of proof on voters seeking invalidation of ballot access statutes. Plaintiffs, after Anderson it seems, need no longer argue that they were denied equal protection because a state's ballot access legislation placed greater restrictions on them than on supporters of major party candidates. As a result of the decision in Anderson, voters bringing suit need only prove that their voting rights have been unnecessarily restricted by a condition for ballot positions.

Anderson not only settled the question of when close scrutiny must apply to ballot access legislation and provided a new rationale for the use of strict review, but also it is consistent in several respects with the Court's earlier rulings. First, the Court has required vigorous scrutiny in a number of other contexts in which state legislation has limited the right to vote. The Court has, for example, used strict scrutiny as the test of the constitutionality of laws restricting eligibility to vote in primaries in Kasper v. Pontikes, laws establishing requirements for voting in Dunn v. Blumstein and Carrington v. Rash, and laws restricting ballot access to interested voters in Kramer v. Union School Free District. Because these laws impinge on the same fundamental rights of voting and association as do ballot access statutes, it was consistent for the Court to extend vigorous review to ballot access legislation as well. Second, Anderson held that a major purpose of its invalidation of Ohio's ballot access law was to assure the free flow of political ideas in the state by protecting the rights of supporters of third party and independent candidates to or-

252 Id. at 973 (Stevens, J., concurring).
253 Anderson, 460 U.S. at 787.
254 Id.
255 "In this case, we base our conclusions directly on the First and Fourteenth Amendments and do not engage in separate Equal Protection Clause analysis." Id. at 786-87, n.7.
256 Id. The Anderson majority did not specifically state whether equal protection suits could continue to be brought to challenge ballot access laws. Apparently, however, the Court did intend to permit such suits. Footnote 7 stated: "we rely ... on the analysis of a number of our prior election cases resting on the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."
257 Id.
258 Id. at 786-87.
259 See, e.g., Williams, 393 U.S. at 29 (the Constitutional violation by Ohio was burdening the first amendment rights of supporters of third party and independent candidates more than those of supporters of Democratic and Republican candidates).
260 See supra notes 254-58 and accompanying text.
262 405 U.S. 330, 349-60 (1972).
ganize. The Court has taken the same approach in previous ballot access rulings. It noted in its earlier decision in Williams v. Rhodes that competition in ideas was a major element in election campaigns. Indeed, the Court has observed that an election is as much a means of disseminating ideas as it is a way of achieving office. The Court has also held that overbroad ballot access restrictions deprive voters not supporting major party candidates of their incentive to organize and to express their political views. Anderson maintained that excessively restricting conditions for ballot access can have a chilling effect on small political groups and can injure the vitality of American political life. Thus, Anderson was decided in accordance with the basic policy considerations the Court expressed in its earlier decisions including Williams and its progeny.

The position taken by the dissent in Anderson is inconsistent with the trend toward using a strict standard. Justice Rehnquist's argument that the standard used in ballot access legislation generally has been minimum scrutiny is not supported by precedent. At the very least, the Court in each decision has claimed it was applying some higher level of scrutiny. Most often, as in American Party of Texas v. White and Storer v. Brown, the Court used a mixed standard of review by inquiring into whether the state legislation protected a compelling interest, but not into whether the state used the least restrictive alternative. Moreover, the dissent identified the central issue in Anderson as the right to candidacy, a right the Court has never recognized as fundamental. Justice Rehnquist's focus on the state's power to regulate candidates rather than on the limitations on the state's ability to restrict voters' rights has been used in only one other ruling — the plurality opinion in Clements v. Fashing which Justice Rehnquist wrote. This approach contradicts the stated purpose of most of the Court's ballot access decisions — maximization of the voter's right to find a candidate of his own political persuasion on the ballot.

Despite the inaccuracy of the Anderson dissent's assertion that precedent indicates that the rational relationship test is ordinarily the appropriate level of review of ballot access laws, the dissent is correct in its argument that the majority's view that states have a minimal interest in a national election is a novel proposition. The majority cited only one case to support its assertion — Cousins v. Wigoda. Cousins, the majority claimed, stood for the proposition that the national interest in the selection of candidates for national office far outweighs the interest of any individual state. The Cousins Court, however, did not make that precise ruling. Rather, in Cousins, the Court held that a state

---

265 Anderson, 460 U.S. at 793-94, 798.
266 See, e.g., Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. at 186; Williams, 393 U.S. at 32.
267 Williams, 393 U.S. at 32.
268 Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. at 186.
269 Williams, 393 U.S. at 41 (Harlan, J., concurring).
270 Anderson, 460 U.S. at 788 n.8.
271 Id. at 817 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
272 See supra notes 44-133 and accompanying text.
275 See also L. Tribe, supra note 95, at 782-83.
276 See Anderson, 460 U.S. at 807 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting); Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. at 963 (Rehnquist, J., plurality opinion).
278 See supra notes 267-69 and accompanying text.
281 Anderson, 460 U.S. at 795.
does not have a sufficient interest in the outcome of a national party convention to demand that the convention seat delegates according to the state's, rather than the party's, election rules. The Court noted in Cousins that if every state could establish qualifications for national delegates without regard to party policy, states could destroy the effectiveness of a national party convention as a concerted enterprise in the vital process of choosing presidential and vice-presidential candidates. It observed further that the states themselves had no constitutionally mandated role in the task of selecting those candidates. The Court did not, however, extend its ruling to hold that in elections, and not merely in conventions, two levels of state interest were present: the state's interest in intrastate elections and the state's interest in national elections. Nor did the Cousins Court hold that a state's power to condition candidates' access to the ballot is measured in part by the interest the state has in the election in question. Nevertheless, the Anderson Court claimed that its holding — that in setting restrictions on access to the presidential ballot, states enter an area in which the national interest is far greater than the interest of any individual state — was grounded on Cousins. The Anderson ruling has no direct support either from Cousins, which ruled merely that each state cannot establish its own rules for election of delegates to a national party's convention, or from the Court's decisions on the issue of ballot access.

B. The Questions Remaining

The Anderson Court established two types of strict scrutiny for ballot access legislation. The Court held that the state must demonstrate that its statute is the least restrictive means available to serve a compelling state interest to justify a state imposed limitation on access to the ballot in any election. In addition, the Court specified that when the election is for president or vice president, the state has the additional burden of showing that the interest that the legislation serves is not merely vital to the state, but is so urgent that it justifies weakening a national campaign effort and therefore limiting the right of voters in other states to cast their votes effectively.

Anderson's creation of two levels of strict scrutiny, one for state laws limiting access to the ballot for intrastate offices and a higher level for legislation limiting access to the ballot for national offices, presents new problems in ballot access analysis. The Anderson decision emphasizes that a state must have a vital interest to advance by its restriction on access to the ballot in a presidential election. According to the Court, however, a state's interest in voter education which might be compelling in an intrastate or local contest, was

283 Id. at 490.
284 Id. at 489-90.
285 See supra notes 168-72 and accompanying text.
election); American Party of Texas v. White, 415 U.S. 767 (1974) (gubernatorial election); Storer v.
(presidential election). The scope of the elections was not mentioned by the Court in any of these cases as a factor in its analyses of whether the statutes the candidates challenged could pass equal protection scrutiny.
288 Id. at 795.
289 See supra notes 165-77 and accompanying text.
290 Id.
not a compelling interest in a presidential election. In addition, the Anderson Court ruled that the state interest in preventing unbridled intraparty feuding, which the Court found a vital state concern in congressional elections in Storer, was not an urgent state interest in presidential elections. The Court gave no hint of what state needs it would find sufficiently vital to justify conditions to ballot access in a national campaign.

In Anderson, the Court affirmed earlier rulings holding that the means a state chooses to serve its interests must not be unnecessarily restrictive of voters first amendment rights. The Court also held, however, that in a presidential election, the restrictiveness of the state's ballot access limitation should be judged by its impact on voters at a national level, not merely by its impact on voters at a statewide or local level. This latter holding seems to require that burdens on presidential candidates be even less restrictive than burdens on other candidates. The Court, however, did not refine this concept or give any example of what a sufficiently narrowly tailored ballot access device might be in the context of a presidential election.

Although the Court has never laid down guidelines for the states on what ballot access legislation is permissible, its earlier decisions did provide some direction. For example, the Court found that avoiding clogging of the election machinery and preventing voter confusion through limiting the number of candidates on ballots were vital state concerns. In addition, it ruled that preventing the division of the vote among so many candidates that none could win a majority was a compelling state interest in light of the public costs involved in run-off elections. Further, the Court determined that the avoidance of intraparty strife was a vital state concern because cohesive, well-functioning parties were important components of a stable democracy. Some devices which the Court approved include modest minimum support requirements and reasonable dis-affiliation statutes. The Court determined that these means can forward important state concerns and only minimally restrict voters' rights. Anderson did not indicate, however, whether any of the interests or devices the Court upheld in its prior decisions could survive the new heightened strict scrutiny applicable to ballot access limitations on presidential candidates. Its earlier rulings on the concerns and the means that pass strict scrutiny therefore can have current validity only for state and local elections. The Court might not uphold any of them as appropriate to a presidential election.

Further, it would seem that Anderson's creation of two levels of strict scrutiny of ballot access legislation would involve the Court in extremely difficult analytic problems. Interests held to be compelling and regulations found to be precisely drawn in the context of state and local elections need not be so in the context of a presidential election. A minimum number of signatures, for example, which a state can require for a ballot position for a gubernatorial candidate might arguably be too high for a presidential candidate. The state's interest in the outcome of a presidential election would be less,

---

292 Id. at 804.
293 Id. at 789.
294 Id. at 794-95.
296 Id.
297 Id.
299 Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. at 185-86.
300 Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. at 736.
301 See supra notes 299-300.
under Anderson, than its interest in the outcome of a state election and the barrier to ballot access that the state establishes would be a hindrance to a nationwide and not merely a statewide election effort. Presumably, therefore, the signature requirement for ballot access should be lower under Anderson in a presidential election than in a state election. To say the least, it would be difficult to discover exactly what that lower requirement should be. The same analytic problems would be involved in ruling on the validity of disaffiliation statutes and every other device a state might use to limit ballot access in a presidential election. Therefore, although Anderson clarifies that legislation limiting access to the ballot in intrastate elections is subject to strict scrutiny, Anderson’s requirement of a heightened strict scrutiny of ballot access restrictions for presidential and vice-presidential candidates creates new confusion. States appear to have less guidance than before Anderson on what state interests the Court would find sufficiently vital to justify ballot access limitations on candidates for national office and what means the Court would find sufficiently narrowly tailored to advance those interests.

CONCLUSION

The Anderson decision attempted to clarify the baffling series of Supreme Court opinions on the validity of state ballot access legislation.302 The Court’s rulings from Williams v. Rhodes to Clements v. Fashing employed three different levels of review of state ballot access statutes.303 Although Justice Stevens, writing for the Anderson majority, never identified his standard of review by the traditional terms associated with strict scrutiny, he subjected Ohio’s law to a rigorous review.304 The decision therefore reinforces the interpretation that ballot access laws which impose significant burdens on voters’ first amendment rights must receive vigorous scrutiny by the courts. Also significant is that the decision made clear equal protection analysis is not necessary in ballot access cases.305 The Anderson Court held that the constitutionality of ballot access laws can be measured solely by the extent to which they unnecessarily restrict voters’ first amendment rights.306 In addition, however, the Anderson Court has drawn a distinction between the states’ power to regulate access to the ballot in intrastate elections in contrast to national elections.307 This distinction complicates ballot access analysis by suggesting that legislation which may pass strict scrutiny as applied to state elections might not be valid for presidential elections.308 In sum, after Anderson, states have somewhat more guidance than they had before on what ballot position qualifications they can enact for intrastate elections. As regards national elections, however, they may have less guidance because the Court did not give any indication of what state interests would be sufficiently compelling to condition ballot access for presidential candidates or what devices the Court would find sufficiently narrowly tailored in furthering such an interest.

Lloyd E. Selbst

---

302 See supra notes 154-210 and accompanying text.
303 See supra notes 45-133 and accompanying text.
304 See supra notes 141-210 and accompanying text.
305 See supra notes 147-50 and accompanying text.
306 Id.
307 See supra notes 166-77 and accompanying text.
308 See supra notes 289-301 and accompanying text.