12-1-1994

Searches Woven From Terry Cloth: How the Plain Feel Doctrine Plus Terry Equals Pretextual Search

John A. Cecere

Follow this and additional works at: http://lawdigitalcommons.bc.edu/bclr

Part of the Criminal Law Commons

Recommended Citation

SEARCHES WOVEN FROM TERRY CLOTH: HOW THE PLAIN FEEL DOCTRINE PLUS TERRY EQUALS PRETEXTUAL SEARCH

[There is nothing new in the realization that the Constitution sometimes insulates the criminality of a few in order to protect the privacy of us all.]

Pacing back and forth in front of the Seven-Eleven at 2:00 a.m., the disheveled man seems nervous and excited, or perhaps confused and disoriented. Police officers observe him repeatedly peering into the window of the convenience store, while fumbling with an object in his pants pocket. After studying this continued activity for approximately fifteen minutes, the officers decide to investigate. Suspicious that the man is "casing" the Seven-Eleven in contemplation of robbing it, and fearing that the man is armed and dangerous, the officers stop him and perform a protective search for weapons. While patting down the man's legs, an officer feels a number of small lumps in one of the suspect's pants pockets, which he immediately believes to be crack cocaine wrapped in cellophane. Based on his twenty years of law enforcement experience, the confused state of mind and suspicious nature of the suspect, and the officer's training in the recognition of crack cocaine, the officer reaches into the man's pocket and seizes its contents. Much to the zealous officer's chagrin, the pocket contains a number of pills in a plastic bag, along with a related prescription for treatment of paranoid schizophrenia, and a grocery list. The suspect is released to do his grocery shopping.

In the above hypothetical, although the seizure of the grocery list and pills—and the resulting discovery that the man apparently suffered from paranoid schizophrenia—may seem to be a serious invasion of privacy, it would be perfectly constitutional according to the United States Supreme Court's 1993 decision in Minnesota v. Dickerson. In Dickerson, the Supreme Court recognized, for the first time, what is now known as the "plain feel" exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement. The Court ruled unanimously that when a law enforcement officer conducting a lawful protective patdown search detects, by feel, something other than a weapon, he or she may seize it without a warrant if the officer's sense of touch makes it immediately apparent that the felt object is contraband.4

---

3 See id. at 2134.

The Court stipulated, however, that the officer may only seize contraband if he or she discovered it while remaining within the bounds of a lawful patdown search.5 Thus, in a purely formal, logical and legal sense, the Court's decision arguably is sound. In a functional, practical sense, however, the decision has the potential to result in police abuse and misconduct. Faced with a strong desire to make an arrest, a police officer may conduct a search for contraband under the pretext of a weapons frisk, or may extend the scope of a patdown search if the officer feels something possibly resembling contraband. Confident that a trier of fact would more likely believe a police officer than a criminal defendant, the officer could claim that the illegal nature of the felt object became immediately apparent on touch. Thus, Dickerson provides an incentive for police officers to conduct illegal searches.

This Note examines the Dickerson decision and its legal and practical implications on the criminal justice process. Section I examines the backdrop of the plain feel doctrine, including stop-and-frisks, the plain view doctrine, and plain feel cases prior to Dickerson.6 Section II examines the details of Dickerson.7 Section III reviews plain feel decisions subsequent to Dickerson.8 Section IV examines the flaws in the Court's reasoning, and suggests that, although the decision may be logically consistent, its practical effects are frightening.9 Finally, Section V discusses alternatives and modifications to the plain feel doctrine that balance society's interest in fighting crime against the individual's interest in being free from unlawful searches.10

I. THE FOURTH AMENDMENT FRAMEWORK

The Fourth Amendment provides that "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against

---

4 See id. at 2136, 2139.
5 See id. at 2139. A patdown search is lawful if the officer performs the search in accordance with the United States Supreme Court's decision in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 27 (1968). See infra notes 50-66 and accompanying text for a more detailed discussion of the Supreme Court's holding in Terry.
6 See infra notes 11-174 and accompanying text.
7 See infra notes 175-232 and accompanying text.
8 See infra notes 233-61 and accompanying text.
9 See infra notes 262-85 and accompanying text.
10 See infra notes 284-301 and accompanying text.
unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause . . . " This amendment is one of the clearest examples of balancing the age-old conflict between social control and individual liberty. On the one hand, law enforcement wants free rein to maintain order and enforce the law. On the other hand, there is a deep-rooted human desire to retain autonomy, maintain privacy, and enforce the security of one’s person and residence.

Two threshold requirements must be met before the Fourth Amendment’s protections will apply in a particular situation. First, the Fourth Amendment applies only to action by the government, not to private conduct. Second, the conduct in question must constitute a search. The Supreme Court, however, has had difficulty defining what constitutes a search. In early Fourth Amendment analysis, the Court closely tied its definition of a search to property concepts. Thus, the Court recognized a government invasion as a search only when government officials physically intruded into a “constitutionally protected area.”

Modern methods of police investigation, which could be accomplished without the necessity for physical intrusion onto one’s prop-

\[11\] U.S. Const. amend. IV.
\[13\] See, e.g., T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 337; Place, 462 U.S. at 703; Terry, 392 U.S. at 22.
\[14\] See, e.g., T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 337; Place, 462 U.S. at 703; Terry, 392 U.S. at 24–25.
\[15\] See T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 333, 337.
\[16\] See, e.g., Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 455, 475 (1921) (Fourth Amendment intended as restraint upon activities of sovereign authority, and was not intended to be limitation upon other than government agencies); Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, 398 (1914) (Fourth Amendment limits action of federal government, not individual misconduct of federal officials).
\[19\] See Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 466 (1928) (placing tap on telephone wires and thereby eavesdropping on defendant’s telephone conversations did not amount to search within meaning of Fourth Amendment, because activity did not constitute trespass); Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57, 59 (1924) (revenue officers trespassing on defendant’s land did not amount to search, because open fields were not constitutionally protected areas).
\[20\] See Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505, 512 (1961) (Fourth Amendment violated where police officers attached microphone to heating duct of house used by defendants). "Constitutionally protected areas" were those enumerated in the Fourth Amendment itself: "persons," including the bodies and clothing of individuals; "houses," including apartments, hotel rooms, garages, business offices, stores and warehouses; "papers," such as letters; and "effects," such as automobiles. 1 LAFAVE, supra note 18, § 2.1(a), at 223–24.
Property, led the way to the abandonment of the property-based approach. It was not until 1967, in Katz v. United States, that the United States Supreme Court completely eradicated its reliance on property interests, and created the notion of a reasonable expectation of privacy. In Katz, the Court held that the Government's placement of a listening device on the wall of a public telephone booth, in order to listen to and record the defendant's conversation, constituted a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The Court rejected the argument that no Fourth Amendment violation occurred because the electronic device did not physically penetrate the wall of the telephone booth. According to the Court, the Fourth Amendment "protects people, not places," and therefore its scope cannot depend on the presence or absence of a physical intrusion into any given enclosure. Rather, the Court reasoned that the Fourth Amendment's applicability depends on whether the government violated an individual's legitimate expectation of privacy. Thus, the Court held that government activity which intruded on an individual's privacy constituted a search protected by the Fourth Amendment, regardless of whether a physical trespass occurred.

Upon a determination that the government executed a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, a court must determine whether that search required a warrant. The warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment requires that an impartial judicial officer assess whether the police have probable cause to make an arrest or conduct a search. Searches conducted without a warrant are "per 21 See Katz, 389 U.S. at 352-53 (electronic surveillance of public telephone booth constitutes search). The premise that property interests controlled the right of the government to search and seize was discredited by the Court's statement in Warden v. Hayden that "the principal object of the Fourth Amendment is the protection of privacy rather than property." 387 U.S. 294, 304 (1967) (reversing "mere evidence" rule which limited police to seizing only fruits, instrumentalities of crime and contraband, and which prohibited police from seizing items of mere evidentiary value).

---

22 See Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 9 (1968); Katz, 389 U.S. at 360 (Harlan, J., concurring); see also Note, A Reconsideration of the Katz Expectation of Privacy Test, 76 Mich. L. Rev. 154, 155 (1977).

23 389 U.S. at 353.

24 Id.

25 Id.

26 Id. In a concurring opinion, Justice Harlan suggested a twofold requirement for determining when an individual possesses a legitimate expectation of privacy. Id. at 361 (Harlan, J., concurring). First, the person must have exhibited an actual, subjective expectation of privacy. Id. (Harlan, J., concurring). Second, the expectation must be one that society is prepared to recognize as reasonable. Id. (Harlan, J., concurring).

27 See id. at 353.

29 See Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 301-02 (1967). Probable cause is the level of suspicion se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions. Over time, the Supreme Court has upheld warrantless searches based on a number of these exceptions.

If the government commits a Fourth Amendment violation, the court must determine whether or not to exclude evidence seized during the search from an accused's trial. The exclusion of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment is embodied in a judicially created doctrine, known as the exclusionary rule. The rule dictates that the government may not use evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment in prosecuting individuals whose rights have been violated. Since 1914, when the United States Supreme Court first adopted the exclusionary rule, lawyers, judges, and legal scholars have endlessly debated its purposes and desirability, and have proposed alternatives to the rule.\textsuperscript{36} Proponents claim that the exclusionary rule provides the only effective method by which courts can safeguard the rights protected by the Fourth Amendment.\textsuperscript{37} Opponents argue that the rule is not justified in light of the burden that it imposes on effective law enforcement.\textsuperscript{38}

Deterrence of police misconduct is the primary justification for the exclusionary rule.\textsuperscript{39} The rule rests on the hope that law enforcement officials will be deterred from unlawful searches and seizures if courts suppress illegally seized, albeit trustworthy, evidence often enough, thereby depriving officers of any benefits that might be gained from illegal conduct.\textsuperscript{40} The United States Supreme Court created the rule in order to give meaning and teeth to the protections guaranteed by the Constitution.\textsuperscript{41} In the absence of the exclusionary rule, an individual was left with no remedy for a violation of his or her constitutional rights.\textsuperscript{42}

Since the 1970s, the Supreme Court has significantly chipped away at the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment and at the scope and applicability of the exclusionary rule.\textsuperscript{43} The Supreme Court began this retrenchment of Fourth Amendment law not by overruling prior decisions, but by exploiting potential loopholes within existing Fourth Amendment jurisprudence.\textsuperscript{44} With respect to the \textit{Dickerson} decision, the two most pertinent exceptions to the warrant requirement are the stop-and-frisk and the plain view doctrines.\textsuperscript{45}

\textbf{A. The Warrantless Stop-and-Frisk}

Although police officers have temporarily detained suspects and even frisked them since the establishment of organized police forces, the law traditionally was silent on the legality of this custom.46 In the 1960s, however, several state statutes and cases attempted to define the authority of the police to make such stops on less than probable cause to arrest.47 Some police officers allegedly used these forms of stop-and-frisk for harassment rather than for legitimate preventive law enforcement.48 This harassment underscored the need for controls that reconciled these competing problems under the Fourth Amendment.49

In 1968, in Terry v. Ohio, the United States Supreme Court held that a police officer may stop and frisk a person when the officer can reasonably conclude that the suspect may be engaged in criminal activity and may be armed and dangerous.50 While on patrol, a Cleveland police detective observed two men, Terry and Chilton, alternately walk past some stores.51 While walking, each man paused to peer into a particular store window, continued past the store, turned around to again peer into the store window, and then rejoined his companion.52 The men repeated this pattern approximately twelve times, for a period of ten to twelve minutes.53 Suspecting that the men were planning a robbery, and fearing they had a gun, the officer approached the men, identified himself as a police officer and asked the men for their names.54 When the men "mumbled something" in response, the officer grabbed Terry, spun him around, and patted down the outside of his clothing.55 The officer felt a pistol in Terry's breast pocket, which he removed.56 The officer then arrested Terry for carrying a concealed weapon.57 The officer later testified that he patted the men down only to discover whether they were carrying weapons.58

In determining whether the officer's patdown weapons search violated the Fourth Amendment, the United States Supreme Court

---

47 See id. at 44.
49 See Terry, 392 U.S. at 12.
50 Id. at 30. This is now referred to as the "reasonable suspicion" test. See, e.g., Minnesota v. Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. 2130, 2136 (1993).
51 Terry, 392 U.S. at 5-6.
52 Id. at 6.
53 Id.
54 Id. at 6-7.
55 Id. at 7.
56 Terry, 392 U.S. at 7.
57 Id.
58 Id.
applied a balancing test. The Court weighed the governmental interest in investigating crime, together with the more immediate interest of protecting police and the public, against the intrusion on individual rights. The Court concluded that the governmental interest outweighed the intrusion on individual rights. Accordingly, the Court held that reasonable suspicion, rather than the higher standard of probable cause, could support a protective search for weapons. Because protective searches are not supported by probable cause, however, the Court warned that the scope of the search must be very limited. According to the Court, the sole justification of the search is to protect the police officer and others nearby. Thus, police officers must confine the scope of the search to an intrusion reasonably designed to discover weapons. The Court concluded that the officer lawfully stopped and frisked Terry to investigate a possible crime, and evidence seized by the officer could be admitted at trial.

B. The Plain View Doctrine

The plain view doctrine is an exception to the warrant requirement in the sense that when an object is in "plain view," the Fourth Amendment does not apply. The doctrine allows police officers to make a warrantless seizure of contraband and other evidence open to view. Police officers may seize evidence in plain view because an individual does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in items that the officer can plainly see. By authorizing the seizure of the item, and not an additional search, the plain view doctrine does not compromise the individual interest in privacy; it merely deprives the individual of his or her possessory interest in the property.\(^{70}\)

In 1971, in Coolidge v. New Hampshire, the United States Supreme Court established the three basic criteria of the law regarding the plain view doctrine.\(^{71}\) After a three week investigation into Coolidge's involvement in a murder, police arrested Coolidge in his house and obtained a warrant to search his car.\(^{72}\) Upon searching Coolidge's car, police seized vacuum sweepings which, along with other evidence, were used against Coolidge at trial.\(^{73}\) The jury found Coolidge guilty of murder.\(^{74}\)

On appeal, the United States Supreme Court first held that the warrant authorizing the seizure and subsequent search of Coolidge's car was invalid.\(^{75}\) The Court next addressed the State's argument that the plain view doctrine justified a warrantless seizure and search of the car.\(^{76}\) The Court reasoned that the legality of any plain view seizure must rest on three criteria.\(^{77}\) First, the initial intrusion must be lawful.\(^{78}\) According to the Court, the initial intrusion must be justified by a warrant or by an exception to the warrant requirement.\(^{79}\) Second, the discovery of the item must be inadvertent and not planned.\(^{80}\) The Court reasoned that this second requirement protects against general exploratory searches conducted under the pretext of a plain view search.\(^{81}\) Third, the grounds for seizure must be immediately apparent to the police.\(^{82}\)

Applying these requirements to the facts of the case, the Court held that the plain view doctrine did not justify the police seizure of Coolidge's car.\(^{83}\) The Court determined that the police knew the location and description of the car well in advance, and intended to seize

---

\(^{71}\) See Coolidge, 403 U.S. at 466, 468-70.

\(^{72}\) Id. at 445-47.

\(^{73}\) Id. at 448.

\(^{74}\) Id.

\(^{75}\) Coolidge, 403 U.S. at 449. The Court found that the warrant was not issued by a neutral and detached magistrate. Id.

\(^{76}\) See id. at 464.

\(^{77}\) See id. at 466, 468-70.

\(^{78}\) See id. at 468.

\(^{79}\) See id. at 467.

\(^{80}\) See Coolidge, 403 U.S. at 469-70.

\(^{81}\) See id. at 470.

\(^{82}\) See id. at 466. The Court has interpreted this third requirement to mean that there must be probable cause to associate the item seized with criminal activity. See Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 326 (1987).

\(^{83}\) See Coolidge, 403 U.S. at 472.
the car when they came upon Coolidge’s property.84 Thus, the Court reasoned that the discovery of the car was not inadvertent.85 In addition, the Court reasoned that the car was not contraband, stolen property, or dangerous in and of itself.86 Thus, the Court reasoned that the illegal character of the car was not immediately apparent to the police.87 The Court concluded that the seizure and subsequent search of the car were unconstitutional, and the evidence obtained during the search was improperly admitted at trial.88

In 1987, in Arizona v. Hicks, the United States Supreme Court provided guidance on the third requirement articulated in Coolidge—the “immediately apparent” requirement.89 The Court held that a police officer performed an unlawful search when he moved stolen stereo equipment without probable cause to believe that the equipment was stolen, in order to view its serial numbers.90 Police officers lawfully entered the defendant’s apartment to search for evidence of a shooting.91 While inside, one officer noticed two sets of expensive stereo equipment in an otherwise ill-furnished apartment.92 Suspecting that the equipment was stolen, the officer moved some of the components in order to read and record their serial numbers.93 The officer then phoned in the numbers to police headquarters.94 Upon learning that one of the components had been stolen in an armed robbery, the officer seized it.95

According to the Court, when the officer took action unrelated to the objectives of the authorized intrusion, he further invaded the defendant’s privacy.96 The Court determined that moving the equipment was unjustified by the circumstances that validated the initial entry into the apartment.97 The Court stressed that shifting the equipment “even a few inches” constituted a search for which the officer needed probable cause.98 The Court concluded that because the in-

---

84 Id.
85 See id.
86 Id.
87 See id.
88 See Coolidge, 403 U.S. at 473.
91 Id. at 323.
92 Id.
93 Id.
94 Id.
95 Hicks, 480 U.S. at 323.
96 See id. at 324–25.
97 See id. at 325.
98 Id.
criminating nature of the stereo equipment was not immediately apparent, the officer's action resulted in an invasion of the defendant's privacy unjustified by the exigent circumstance that validated the entry.99

In 1990, in Horton v. California, the United States Supreme Court rejected the Coolidge inadvertence requirement.100 In Horton, the police developed probable cause to search Horton's home for the proceeds of a robbery, and for the weapons used in the robbery.101 In applying for a search warrant to a magistrate, the officer submitted an affidavit mentioning both the robbery proceeds and the weapons.102 The warrant issued by the magistrate, however, mentioned only the stolen property.103 When executing the warrant, the officer did not discover the stolen property, but he did discover the weapons in plain sight.104
The officer later testified that he was interested in finding other evidence during the search for stolen property.105 Thus, he did not discover the evidence "inadvertently."106 Nevertheless, the Court denied Horton's motion to suppress, and he was convicted of armed robbery.107

In determining that the inadvertence requirement was unnecessary, the Court reasoned that the requirement adds nothing to the protection of an individual's right to privacy.108 First, the Court determined that evenhanded law enforcement is best achieved by the application of objective standards of conduct, rather than standards that depend upon the subjective state of mind of the officer.109 Second, the Court reasoned that the particularity requirement of the Fourth Amendment already serves to prevent the police from conducting general or pretextual searches, and thus the inadvertence requirement is unnecessary.110 According to the Court, if the scope of the search exceeds either the terms of a valid warrant or the permissible limits of a warrantless search, any subsequent seizure is unconstitutional, regard-

---

99 See id. at 324–25.
101 Id. at 130–31.
102 Id. at 131.
103 Id.
104 Id.
105 Horton, 496 U.S. at 131.
106 Id.
107 Id. at 130, 131.
108 See id. at 139–140.
109 Id. at 138.
110 See Horton, 496 U.S. at 139–40. The Fourth Amendment requires that a warrant describe with particularity "the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." U.S. Const.
amend. IV. This limitation safeguards the individual's privacy interest against "the wide-ranging exploratory searches the Framers intended to prohibit." Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 84 less of the existence of the inadvertence requirement. On the other hand, if the scope of the search is lawful, the Court reasoned that the government has already invaded the individual's interest in privacy, and thus no additional right against seizure is required other than the "immediately apparent" requirement. The Court concluded that the plain view doctrine authorized the seizure, even though discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Horton. According to Justice Brennan, the majority, in eschewing the inadvertence requirement, ignored the Fourth Amendment's express command that warrants particularly describe not only the places to be searched, but also the items to be seized. The dissent stressed that the Fourth Amendment protects both privacy interests and possessory interests. While conceding that the inadvertence requirement does not further any privacy interests, the dissent reasoned that the requirement does protect possessory interests. Thus, the dissent reasoned that by eliminating the inadvertence requirement, the majority modified the Fourth Amendment to give preference to privacy interests over possessory interests—a result contrary to both the express terms and recent interpretation of the Fourth Amendment.

In sum, the plain view doctrine permits an officer to make a warrantless seizure of incriminating items that the officer discovers while engaged in an otherwise lawful search, as long as the incriminating nature of the items is immediately apparent to the officer. The doctrine does not permit a search, but only a seizure of an item already discovered. The rationale of the plain view doctrine is that an individual can have no legitimate expectation of privacy in items that the individual has left open to view. Although Horton rejected the inadvertence requirement, the Court reasoned that the government has already invaded the individual's interest in privacy, and thus no additional right against seizure is required other than the "immediately apparent" requirement. The Court concluded that the plain view doctrine authorized the seizure, even though discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Horton. According to Justice Brennan, the majority, in eschewing the inadvertence requirement, ignored the Fourth Amendment's express command that warrants particularly describe not only the places to be searched, but also the items to be seized. The dissent stressed that the Fourth Amendment protects both privacy interests and possessory interests. While conceding that the inadvertence requirement does not further any privacy interests, the dissent reasoned that the requirement does protect possessory interests. Thus, the dissent reasoned that by eliminating the inadvertence requirement, the majority modified the Fourth Amendment to give preference to privacy interests over possessory interests—a result contrary to both the express terms and recent interpretation of the Fourth Amendment.

In sum, the plain view doctrine permits an officer to make a warrantless seizure of incriminating items that the officer discovers while engaged in an otherwise lawful search, as long as the incriminating nature of the items is immediately apparent to the officer. The doctrine does not permit a search, but only a seizure of an item already discovered. The rationale of the plain view doctrine is that an individual can have no legitimate expectation of privacy in items that the individual has left open to view. Although Horton rejected the inadvertence requirement, the Court reasoned that the government has already invaded the individual's interest in privacy, and thus no additional right against seizure is required other than the "immediately apparent" requirement. The Court concluded that the plain view doctrine authorized the seizure, even though discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Horton. According to Justice Brennan, the majority, in eschewing the inadvertence requirement, ignored the Fourth Amendment's express command that warrants particularly describe not only the places to be searched, but also the items to be seized. The dissent stressed that the Fourth Amendment protects both privacy interests and possessory interests. While conceding that the inadvertence requirement does not further any privacy interests, the dissent reasoned that the requirement does protect possessory interests. Thus, the dissent reasoned that by eliminating the inadvertence requirement, the majority modified the Fourth Amendment to give preference to privacy interests over possessory interests—a result contrary to both the express terms and recent interpretation of the Fourth Amendment.

In sum, the plain view doctrine permits an officer to make a warrantless seizure of incriminating items that the officer discovers while engaged in an otherwise lawful search, as long as the incriminating nature of the items is immediately apparent to the officer. The doctrine does not permit a search, but only a seizure of an item already discovered. The rationale of the plain view doctrine is that an individual can have no legitimate expectation of privacy in items that the individual has left open to view. Although Horton rejected the inadvertence requirement, the Court reasoned that the government has already invaded the individual's interest in privacy, and thus no additional right against seizure is required other than the "immediately apparent" requirement. The Court concluded that the plain view doctrine authorized the seizure, even though discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Horton. According to Justice Brennan, the majority, in eschewing the inadvertence requirement, ignored the Fourth Amendment's express command that warrants particularly describe not only the places to be searched, but also the items to be seized. The dissent stressed that the Fourth Amendment protects both privacy interests and possessory interests. While conceding that the inadvertence requirement does not further any privacy interests, the dissent reasoned that the requirement does protect possessory interests. Thus, the dissent reasoned that by eliminating the inadvertence requirement, the majority modified the Fourth Amendment to give preference to privacy interests over possessory interests—a result contrary to both the express terms and recent interpretation of the Fourth Amendment.

In sum, the plain view doctrine permits an officer to make a warrantless seizure of incriminating items that the officer discovers while engaged in an otherwise lawful search, as long as the incriminating nature of the items is immediately apparent to the officer. The doctrine does not permit a search, but only a seizure of an item already discovered. The rationale of the plain view doctrine is that an individual can have no legitimate expectation of privacy in items that the individual has left open to view. Although Horton rejected the inadvertence requirement, the Court reasoned that the government has already invaded the individual's interest in privacy, and thus no additional right against seizure is required other than the "immediately apparent" requirement. The Court concluded that the plain view doctrine authorized the seizure, even though discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Horton. According to Justice Brennan, the majority, in eschewing the inadvertence requirement, ignored the Fourth Amendment's express command that warrants particularly describe not only the places to be searched, but also the items to be seized. The dissent stressed that the Fourth Amendment protects both privacy interests and possessory interests. While conceding that the inadvertence requirement does not further any privacy interests, the dissent reasoned that the requirement does protect possessory interests. Thus, the dissent reasoned that by eliminating the inadvertence requirement, the majority modified the Fourth Amendment to give preference to privacy interests over possessory interests—a result contrary to both the express terms and recent interpretation of the Fourth Amendment.

In sum, the plain view doctrine permits an officer to make a warrantless seizure of incriminating items that the officer discovers while engaged in an otherwise lawful search, as long as the incriminating nature of the items is immediately apparent to the officer. The doctrine does not permit a search, but only a seizure of an item already discovered. The rationale of the plain view doctrine is that an individual can have no legitimate expectation of privacy in items that the individual has left open to view. Although Horton rejected the inadvertence requirement, the Court reasoned that the government has already invaded the individual's interest in privacy, and thus no additional right against seizure is required other than the "immediately apparent" requirement. The Court concluded that the plain view doctrine authorized the seizure, even though discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Horton. According to Justice Brennan, the majority, in eschewing the inadvertence requirement, ignored the Fourth Amendment's express command that warrants particularly describe not only the places to be searched, but also the items to be seized. The dissent stressed that the Fourth Amendment protects both privacy interests and possessory interests. While conceding that the inadvertence requirement does not further any privacy interests, the dissent reasoned that the requirement does protect possessory interests. Thus, the dissent reasoned that by eliminating the inadvertence requirement, the majority modified the Fourth Amendment to give preference to privacy interests over possessory interests—a result contrary to both the express terms and recent interpretation of the Fourth Amendment.

In sum, the plain view doctrine permits an officer to make a warrantless seizure of incriminating items that the officer discovers while engaged in an otherwise lawful search, as long as the incriminating nature of the items is immediately apparent to the officer. The doctrine does not permit a search, but only a seizure of an item already discovered. The rationale of the plain view doctrine is that an individual can have no legitimate expectation of privacy in items that the individual has left open to view. Although Horton rejected the inadvertence requirement, the Court reasoned that the government has already invaded the individual's interest in privacy, and thus no additional right against seizure is required other than the "immediately apparent" requirement. The Court concluded that the plain view doctrine authorized the seizure, even though discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Horton. According to Justice Brennan, the majority, in eschewing the inadvertence requirement, ignored the Fourth Amendment's express command that warrants particularly describe not only the places to be searched, but also the items to be seized. The dissent stressed that the Fourth Amendment protects both privacy interests and possessory interests. While conceding that the inadvertence requirement does not further any privacy interests, the dissent reasoned that the requirement does protect possessory interests. Thus, the dissent reasoned that by eliminating the inadvertence requirement, the majority modified the Fourth Amendment to give preference to privacy interests over possessory interests—a result contrary to both the express terms and recent interpretation of the Fourth Amendment.

In sum, the plain view doctrine permits an officer to make a warrantless seizure of incriminating items that the officer discovers while engaged in an otherwise lawful search, as long as the incriminating nature of the items is immediately apparent to the officer. The doctrine does not permit a search, but only a seizure of an item already discovered. The rationale of the plain view doctrine is that an individual can have no legitimate expectation of privacy in items that the individual has left open to view. Although Horton rejected the inadvertence requirement, the Court reasoned that the government has already invaded the individual's interest in privacy, and thus no additional right against seizure is required other than the "immediately apparent" requirement. The Court concluded that the plain view doctrine authorized the seizure, even though discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent.
vertence requirement originally articulated in Coolidge, the remainder of the plain view doctrine remains firmly entrenched in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence.123

C. The Plain Feel Corollary

The plain feel exception to the warrant requirement evolved as a corollary to the plain view doctrine.124 The plain feel doctrine provides that when an officer feels an object in the course of a Terry stop, and this touching provides probable cause for a further search or seizure, the further intrusion need not be authorized by a warrant.125 Although most state and federal courts recognized this exception prior to the United States Supreme Court decision in Dickerson, some state courts have rejected the plain feel corollary.126

Courts that have adopted the plain feel doctrine reason that a law enforcement officer should be able to use all of his or her senses in the determination of whether probable cause exists.127 For example, in 1987, in United States v. Williams, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit expressly adopted the plain feel doctrine.128 The court held that a police officer who, upon touching a paper bag immediately realized that it contained contraband, justifiably seized that bag.129 In Williams, four narcotics officers traveling in an unmarked van observed Williams and two other individuals seated in 123 See id. at 2136-37; Horton, 496 U.S. at 130.

125 Haselkorn, supra note 124, at 683.
126 Compare United States v. Coleman, 969 F.2d 126, 132 (5th Cir. 1992) (seizure of pouch containing weapon during valid automobile search justified under plain feel doctrine) and United States v. Buchannon, 878 F.2d 1065, 1067 (8th Cir. 1989) (seizure of cocaine during valid patdown search justified under plain feel doctrine) and United States v. Williams, 822 F.2d 1174, 1184-86 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (seizure of bag containing contraband during patdown search justified under plain feel doctrine) and People v. Chavers, 658 P.2d 96, 102 (Cal. 1983) (seizure of weapon in opaque shaving kit during valid automobile search justified under plain feel doctrine) and State v. Guy, 492 N.W.2d 311, 317 (Wis. 1992) (seizure of bag containing cocaine during lawful patdown search justified under plain feel doctrine), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 3020 (1993) with State v. Collins, 679 P.2d 80, 81-82 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1983) (seizure of objects that were obviously not weapons violates Fourth Amendment; no plain feel exception to Fourth Amendment exists) and People v. Diaz, 612 N.E.2d 298, 301 (N.Y. 1993) (plain feel exception is contrary to both state and federal constitutions) and State v. Rhodes, 788 P.2d 1580, 1381 (Okla. Crim. App. 1990) (officer not justified in seizing object that he felt in course of patdown search unless object reasonably resembles weapon) and State v. Broadnax, 654 P.2d 96, 102 (Wash. 1982) (soft bulge in defendant's shirt pocket was not itself sufficient information to find probable cause).
128 822 F.2d at 1184.
129 Id. at 1177, 1184.
a parked automobile. The officers observed that Williams and his front seat passenger were "bent over" and apparently concentrating on "something in their laps." Based on their experience investigating narcotics offenses and the fact that the car was parked in an area known for extensive drug use, the officers suspected a narcotics violation. As two of the officers approached the van, they saw Williams shove a "brown object" or "paper bag" underneath his leg. Believing that the bag might contain a weapon, one officer asked Williams to step out of the car. As Williams began to step out, he put his right hand under his leg and attempted, unsuccessfully, to throw the bag into the back seat of the car. At that point, the officer picked up the bag and felt it with both hands. According to the officer, when he touched the bag, he could "feel that inside were numerous small rolled-up objects" that "felt like plastic baggies." Based on this touching and his experience and training in narcotics detection, the officer believed that the bag contained "numerous quarter bags of heroin." Upon opening the bag, the officer found five large bags with forty-four small bags containing heroin. He then placed Williams under arrest. The district court judge trying the case admitted the evidence. Williams was convicted of possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute.

On appeal, the D.C. Circuit upheld the warrantless seizure of the heroin based on a plain feel principle. The court, however, established three limitations to the principle. First, the court noted that the plain feel doctrine applies only when an officer may legally touch the container in the first place. The court reasoned that the officer's fear that the bag contained a weapon justified the officer in touching the bag. Second, the touching must be limited to that justified by the 130 Id. at 1176.

131 Id.
132 Id.
133 Williams, 822 F.2d at 1176.
134 Id. at 1177.
135 Id.
136 Id.
137 Id.
138 Williams, 822 F.2d at 1177.
139 Id.
140 Id.
141 Id. at 1176.
142 Id. at 1175–76.
143 Williams, 822 F.2d at 1184.
144 Id.
145 Id.
146 Id. at 1179–80.
initial contact with the object.\textsuperscript{147} The court noted that nothing in the record established that the officer continued to manipulate the container after the absence of a weapon became apparent.\textsuperscript{148} Third, the touching must convince the officer, to a reasonable certainty, that the felt object is contraband or evidence of a crime.\textsuperscript{149} The court reasoned that the specificity of the officer’s determination of the bag’s contents, along with the officer’s training and experience in the area, supported the conclusion that the officer was reasonably certain that the bag contained contraband.\textsuperscript{150} Thus, the court upheld the warrantless seizure of the contraband, and the lower court’s denial of the motion to suppress the evidence.\textsuperscript{151}

Courts that have declined to extend the plain view doctrine to the sense of touch reason that the sense of touch is inherently less immediate and less reliable than the sense of sight, and is far more intrusive into the personal privacy that lies at the core of the Fourth Amendment.\textsuperscript{152} For example, in 1993, in \textit{People v. Diaz}, the Court of Appeals of New York rejected the plain feel exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement.\textsuperscript{153} While on patrol, two officers observed several groups congregating on the sidewalks, apparently passing objects from hand to hand.\textsuperscript{154} The officers further observed Diaz at various times at the center of several of these groups.\textsuperscript{155} The officers became suspicious when Diaz walked away from them as their squad car approached.\textsuperscript{156} The officers drove alongside Diaz and called him over to the car.\textsuperscript{157} In walking toward the car, Diaz repeatedly placed his hand in his pocket, despite the officers’ warnings against doing so.\textsuperscript{158} As Diaz reached the car, one of the officers noticed a bulge in Diaz’s pocket

\textsuperscript{147} \textit{Id.} at 1184.
\textsuperscript{148} \textit{Williams}, 822 F.2d at 1186.
\textsuperscript{149} \textit{Id.} at 1184. According to the court, this third limitation distinguishes a plain feel analysis from a plain view analysis. \textit{Id.} Unlike plain view, where probable cause—a predictive judgment that further investigation will yield particular results—suffices to exempt the seizure from Fourth Amendment warrant requirements, the information gleaned in plain feel must be good enough to eliminate all need for additional search activity. \textit{Id.} at 1184–85. This can only occur when sensory information acquired by the officer rises to a state of certitude, rather than mere prediction, in regard to the object of the investigation. \textit{Id.} at 1185.
\textsuperscript{150} See \textit{id.} at 1185, 1186.
\textsuperscript{151} \textit{Id.} at 1186.
\textsuperscript{153} \textit{Diaz}, 612 N.E.2d at 301.
\textsuperscript{154} \textit{Id.} at 299.
\textsuperscript{155} \textit{Id.}
\textsuperscript{156} See \textit{id.}
\textsuperscript{157} \textit{Id.}
\textsuperscript{158} \textit{Diaz}, 612 N.E.2d at 299.
and again told Diaz to remove his hand. He was afraid of a weapon, so the officer grabbed Diaz’s pocket. He felt no weapon, but did detect what “appeared to be a bunch of vials.” Diaz attempted to flee, but the officer grabbed him, reached into Diaz’s pocket, and removed eighteen vials of crack cocaine. The officers then placed Diaz under arrest. At trial, the court granted Diaz’s motion to suppress. The Appellate Division reversed and denied the motion. Contrary to the trial court, the appellate court found reasonable suspicion to justify the stop and patdown.

The New York Court of Appeals held in favor of Diaz, and refused to recognize a plain feel doctrine. According to the court, an owner holds no expectation of privacy for an object in plain view. When an owner conceals an object by clothing or other covering, however, that owner retains a legitimate expectation that the item’s existence and characteristics will remain private. Although in most instances seeing an object will instantly reveal its identity and nature, the court reasoned that touching an object is inherently less reliable and cannot conclusively establish an object’s identity or criminal nature. Moreover, the court noted, in drawing conclusions as to the nature of an object by feeling it through an exterior covering, the police officer relies solely on expert opinion that cannot be equated with information obtained by seeing the object. The court also feared that a plain feel doctrine would invite the use of weapon searches as a pretext for unwarranted searches, thus severely eroding the protection of the Fourth Amendment. The court concluded, therefore, that the claimed analogy of plain feel to plain view did not withstand analysis.

\[\text{References}\]

159 Id.
160 Id.
161 Id.
162 Id. at 299-300.
163 Diaz, 612 N.E.2d at 300.
164 Id.
165 Id.
166 Id.
167 See id.
168 Diaz, 612 N.E.2d at 301.
169 Id.
170 Id.
171 Id. at 302.
172 Id.
173 Diaz, 612 N.E.2d at 302.
174 Id. at 301.
II. THE DICKERSON DECISION

In 1993, in Dickerson, the United States Supreme Court explicitly recognized a plain feel exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement. The Court ruled unanimously that when a law enforcement officer conducting a lawful protective patdown search detects, by feel, something other than a weapon, he or she may seize it without a warrant if the officer's sense of touch makes it immediately apparent that the felt object is contraband. The Court justified its holding by analogizing to the plain view doctrine.

On November 9, 1989, Minneapolis police officers Vernon Rose and Bruce Johnson were patrolling an area on the city's north side, when Officer Rose spotted the defendant, Timothy Dickerson, leaving a twelve-unit apartment building. Officer Rose, having previously responded to complaints of drug activity in the building's hallways, considered the building to be a "crack house." Officer Rose testified that Dickerson began walking toward him but, upon spotting the squad car and making eye contact with Rose, abruptly halted and began walking in the opposite direction. Based upon Dickerson's seemingly evasive actions and the fact that he had just left a building known for cocaine traffic, the officers decided to stop Dickerson and investigate further.

---

176 See Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2137.
177 Id. In the facts of this case, however, the Court held that the search exceeded the bounds of Terry because the search was not limited to that which was necessary for the discovery of weapons. Id. at 2139. Three Justices, concurring in part and dissenting in part, agreed on the adoption of a plain feel doctrine, but would have remanded the case in order to further examine whether the frisk exceeded that authorized by Terry. Id. at 2141 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
178 Id. at 2139.
180 Id. at 464. For a description of a "crack house," see Scott Minerbrook, A Night in a Crack House, U.S. News & World Rep., Apr. 10, 1989, at 29 ("[T]he term crack house can mean different things—a place to use [crack cocaine], a place to sell [crack cocaine] or a place to do both, and the location may be an apartment, bungalow or abandoned building. If the focus is on sales, the crack house often has iron bars on the windows, steel plating on the door and lookouts prowling nearby. The [crack cocaine] is passed through slots in windows or doors. Efficient operations clear $10,000 a day. Customers without cash try to barter television, jewelry or guns for one more rock [of crack cocaine]. Women frequently 'work a twist'—trade sex for crack.").
181 Dickerson I, 469 N.W.2d at 464.
182 Id.
The officers ordered Dickerson to submit to a patdown search.\textsuperscript{182} Although the search revealed no weapons, Officer Rose felt a small lump through Dickerson’s nylon jacket.\textsuperscript{183} Officer Rose later testified: “[A]s I pat-searched the front of his body, I felt a lump, a small lump, in the front pocket. I examined it with my fingers and it slid and it felt to be a lump of crack cocaine in cellophane.”\textsuperscript{184} Officer Rose then reached into Dickerson’s pocket and retrieved a small plastic bag containing one-fifth of one gram of crack cocaine.\textsuperscript{185} The officers arrested Dickerson and charged him with possession of a controlled substance.\textsuperscript{186}

The Minnesota trial court denied Dickerson’s motion to suppress the cocaine.\textsuperscript{187} First, the court concluded that \textit{Terry} justified the officers in stopping Dickerson and frisking him to ensure that he was not carrying a weapon.\textsuperscript{188} Next, the court, analogizing to the plain view doctrine, determined that seizure of the cocaine did not violate the Fourth Amendment.\textsuperscript{189} The court reasoned that the sense of touch, to an experienced officer, is as reliable as perceptions drawn from other senses.\textsuperscript{190} The court thus admitted the cocaine and found Dickerson guilty of possession of a controlled substance.\textsuperscript{191}

The Court of Appeals of Minnesota reversed.\textsuperscript{192} Although the court agreed with the trial court that \textit{Terry} authorized the investigative stop and protective patdown search of Dickerson, it concluded that the officers overstepped the bounds allowed by \textit{Terry} in seizing the cocaine.\textsuperscript{193} In addition, the appeals court specifically refused to adopt the plain feel exception to the warrant requirement.\textsuperscript{194}

The Minnesota Supreme Court rejected the plain feel exception and agreed with the court of appeals, holding that the officer was not privileged to manipulate the object to determine its identity.\textsuperscript{195} First,

\textsuperscript{182} Id.
\textsuperscript{183} Id.
\textsuperscript{184} \textit{Dickerson}, 113 S. Ct. at 2133.
\textsuperscript{185} Id. at 2133–34.
\textsuperscript{186} Id. at 2134.
\textsuperscript{187} Id.
\textsuperscript{188} Id.
\textsuperscript{189} \textit{Dickerson}, 113 S. Ct. at 2134.
\textsuperscript{190} Id.
\textsuperscript{191} Id.
\textsuperscript{192} \textit{Dickerson I}, 469 N.W.2d at 467.
\textsuperscript{193} Id. at 465.
\textsuperscript{194} Id. at 466.
\textsuperscript{195} \textit{Dickerson II}, 481 N.W.2d 840, 843–44, 846 (Minn. 1992).
the court held the stop valid, reasoning that Dickerson's evasive conduct, combined with his departure from a building with a history of drug activity, justified police in reasonably suspecting criminal activity. In addition, the court held that the officers were justified in performing the patdown search, based on Dickerson's suspicious be-behavior and Officer Rose's personal experience in seizing guns from the building that Dickerson just left.

The Minnesota Supreme Court held, however, that the officer exceeded the scope of a Terry search by continuing to feel the lump in Dickerson's jacket after ascertaining that it was not a weapon. In addition, the court refused to recognize a plain feel exception to the warrant requirement, noting that neither the Minnesota Supreme Court nor the United States Supreme Court had ever acknowledged such an exception. In rejecting the analogy to the plain view doctrine, the court reasoned that the senses of sight and touch are not equivalent.

First, the court observed that the sense of touch is inherently less immediate and less reliable than the sense of sight. Second, and more importantly, the court reasoned that the sense of touch is far more intrusive into the personal privacy that is at the core of the Fourth Amendment, because it involves physical touching. In addition, the court stated that even if it did recognize a plain feel exception, the search in this case would not qualify, because the officers conducting the patdown search never gained probable cause to justify the more extensive search they performed. Thus, the majority held in favor of the defendant, affirming the reversal of Dickerson's conviction.

The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve the conflict among the state and federal courts concerning the existence of the plain feel exception. The Court held that contraband detected through the sense of touch during a patdown search may be admitted into evidence, so long as the search was within the bounds marked by Terry. Under the facts of the case, however, the Court determined

---

196 Id. at 843.
197 Id.
198 Id. at 846.
199 Id. at 843–44.
200 Dickerson II, 481 N.W.2d at 845.
201 Id.
202 Id.
203 Id. at 844 n.1, 846.
204 Id. at 846.
205 Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2134.
206 Id. at 2136.
that the search of Dickerson's jacket exceeded the lawful bounds marked by Terry, and therefore held in favor of Dickerson.207

The Court began its opinion by reasoning that Terry opened the door for adoption of the plain feel doctrine.208 Under Terry, an officer may conduct a patdown search and seize a suspected weapon if perceived through the officer's sense of touch.209 The Court reasoned that an officer should not be required to ignore any contraband discovered while conducting a legitimate Terry search.210

The Court then analogized to the plain view doctrine, reasoning that the warrantless seizure of contraband detected through an officer's sense of touch is justified by the realization that resort to a neutral magistrate in order to obtain a warrant would often be impracticable and would do little to promote the objectives of the Fourth Amendment.211 According to the Court, because items in open view are observed by an officer from a lawful vantage point, there is no invasion of a legitimate expectation of privacy.212 Thus, no "search" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment has occurred when an officer makes a plain view seizure.213 Similarly, the Court reasoned that if an officer lawfully pats down a suspect's outer clothing and feels an object whose contour makes its identity immediately apparent, there has been no invasion of the suspect's privacy beyond that already authorized by the officer's search for weapons.214

In rejecting the position of the Minnesota Supreme Court that the sense of touch is inherently less immediate and less reliable than the sense of sight, the Court noted that the Terry decision itself demonstrates that the sense of touch is capable of revealing the nature of an object with sufficient reliability to support its seizure.215 The Court further stated that any argument that the sense of touch was less reliable than the sense of sight would only suggest that the officers would less often be able to justify seizures of unseen contraband.216 The Court reasoned that the Fourth Amendment's requirement that the officer have probable cause to believe that an item is contraband before

---

207 Id. at 2139.
208 See id. at 2136.
209 See id. See supra notes 50-66 and accompanying text for a more detailed discussion of the Supreme Court's holding in Terry.
210 See Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2136.
211 Id. at 2137.
212 Id.
213 Id.
214 Id.
215 Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2137.
216 Id.
seizing it would protect against excessively speculative seizures. The Court also rejected the Minnesota Supreme Court's concern that touch intrudes more into privacy than sight. The Court reasoned that this feared intrusion had already been authorized by the lawful search for weapons, and that the seizure of an item whose identity is already known does not constitute a further invasion of privacy.

In applying these principles to the facts, the Dickerson Court relied on the conclusion of the Minnesota District Court that Officer Rose "never thought the lump was a weapon," and determined the lump to be contraband only after "squeezing, sliding and otherwise manipulating the contents of the defendant's pocket." The Court noted that the Minnesota trial court never made precise findings as to whether Officer Rose acted within the lawful bounds marked by Terry at the time he gained probable cause to believe that Dickerson's jacket contained contraband. The Court nevertheless held that the officer overstepped the bounds of the strictly circumscribed search for weapons allowed under Terry. The Court reasoned that the officer's continued exploration of Dickerson's pocket, after he concluded that it contained no weapon, was unrelated to the sole justification of the search under Terry—the protection of the police officer and others nearby. The Court analogized to Arizona v. Hicks, in which the police, while lawfully searching the defendant's apartment for weapons, obtained probable cause to believe that stereo equipment, in plain view, was contraband, only after moving the equipment in order to read its serial numbers. Because probable cause to believe that the equipment was stolen arose only as a result of a further search, the Court in that case held the evidence properly inadmissible. Similarly, the Court reasoned that although Officer Rose was lawfully in a position to feel the lump in Dickerson's pocket, the incriminating character of the object was not immediately apparent to him. Thus, the Court concluded, although Terry entitled Officer Rose to place his hands upon Dickerson's jacket, neither Terry nor any other exception to the war-

\[\text{References}\]

217 Id.
218 Id. at 2137–38.
219 Id. at 2138.
220 Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2138.
221 Id.
222 Id.
223 Id. at 2138–39.
224 Id. at 2139; Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 324–25 (1987).
225 Hicks, 480 U.S. at 326, 329.
226 Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2139.
rant requirement authorized the search. Accordingly, the Court held in favor of Dickerson.

In sum, the majority in Dickerson unanimously held that when a law enforcement officer, while conducting a lawful frisk, detects by feel something other than a weapon, the officer may seize the object without a warrant if the officer’s sense of touch makes it immediately apparent that the felt object is contraband. The Court held, however, that the frisk must remain within the bounds of the weapons frisk permitted by Terry. Accordingly, the object must be immediately identifiable as contraband in order to be subject to seizure. Because the case at issue did not meet this standard, the Court held the search and seizure unlawful.

III. POST-DICKERSON DECISIONS

Since Dickerson, a number of courts have had the opportunity to consider the plain feel doctrine. Several of these cases have helped 227 Id. Justice Scalia, in a separate concurring opinion, questioned whether the physical search—the “frisk” portion of the Terry “stop-and-frisk”—is a proper interpretation of the Fourth Amendment. Id. (Scalia, J., concurring). Noting that there is no precedent in common law for searching persons who are not yet under arrest, Justice Scalia doubted whether the Framers of the Constitution would have allowed themselves to be subjected, on mere suspicion of being armed and dangerous, to the indignity of such a search. Id. at 2140 (Scalia, J., concurring). Recognizing that constitutionality of the “frisk” in the present case was neither challenged nor argued, however, Justice Scalia agreed with the Court’s premise that any evidence incidentally discovered in the course of the search would be admissible. Id. at 2141 (Scalia, J., concurring).

---

228 Id. at 2139. Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices Blackmun and Thomas, concurred in part and dissented in part. Id. at 2141 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The Chief Justice agreed on the adoption of a plain feel doctrine, but would have vacated the judgment of the Minnesota Supreme Court and remanded the case to that court for further proceedings. Id. (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The Chief Justice noted that the state trial court made no precise findings as to the dispositive issue of whether the officer who conducted the search was acting within the lawful bounds marked by Terry. Id. (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Thus, because the state supreme court employed a Fourth Amendment analysis differing significantly from that adopted by the Court, the Chief Justice would vacate its judgment and remand the case for further proceedings on the question as to when, during the course of the search, Officer Rose developed probable cause to believe that the lump constituted contraband. Id. (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

229 Id. at 2137.

230 Id. at 2139.

231 Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2139.

232 Id.

233 Many of these courts have concluded that the seizure of contraband did not meet the “immediately apparent” requirement of the plain feel doctrine, or that the arresting officer overstepped the bounds of Terry while performing the patdown search. See United States v. Schiavo, 29 F.3d 6, 9 (1st Cir. 1994); United States v. Gibson, 19 F.3d 1449, 1451 (D.C. Cir. 1994); United States v. Ponce, 8 F.3d 989, 999 (1st Cir. 1993); United States v. Taylor, 997 F.2d 1551, define the "immediately apparent" requirement of the plain feel doctrine in situations where the felt object was not itself contraband. For example, in 1993, in United States v. Ross, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Alabama held that seizure of a matchbox containing cocaine during a patdown search was illegal, because the matchbox itself could not be immediately recognizable as contraband. While performing a patdown search of the defendant, the officer felt a small box tucked in the defendant's groin, which the officer immediately identified as a hollow matchbox. Based on the location of the matchbox in the groin area, the officer immediately suspected that the box contained hidden contraband. The government argued that the officer's informed "suspicion" met the "immediately apparent" requirement of Dickerson. The court reasoned that such a construction would contort the holding of Dickerson. Because the officer believed only that the box contained contraband, and not that the box was itself contraband, the court reasoned that its illegal seizure was improper.
nature could not be immediately apparent.\textsuperscript{240} The court emphasized that the only way the officer could have verified his suspicions concerning the contents of the box was by removing the box and looking inside.\textsuperscript{241} According to the court, \textit{Dickerson} does not allow such action.\textsuperscript{242} Thus, the court concluded that the officer illegally seized the cocaine.\textsuperscript{243}

Even in situations where an officer feels contraband \textit{itself}, and claims that its illegal nature was immediately apparent, a court still may discredit the officer's testimony and invalidate the seizure.\textsuperscript{244} For example, in 1993, in \textit{United States v. Mitchell}, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi held that the plain feel doctrine did not justify a warrantless seizure of a bag in the defendant's pocket, despite testimony that crack cocaine was immediately apparent to the officers upon patting the defendant.\textsuperscript{245} The crack cocaine removed from the defendant was contained in six plastic bags, which were wrapped in a sock.\textsuperscript{246} The sock was in a brown paper bag, which the defendant carried in the pocket of a dense, heavy grade, leather jacket with lined pockets.\textsuperscript{247} Based on this information, the court was not convinced that an immediately apparent determination of contraband was "within the realm of human capability with a single pass of one's hand over the outer clothing."\textsuperscript{248} The court concluded that, under the facts of this case, the police exceeded the limits of a \textit{Terry} search.\textsuperscript{249}

In many cases, however, courts have upheld seizures of contraband detected during patdown searches, relying on the officer's testimony.\textsuperscript{250}

\textsuperscript{240} \textit{Id.} The court noted that the holding might have been different if the defendant had been carrying the cocaine simply in a plastic bag in his pelvic area, through which the contours or mass of contraband could be sensed. \textit{Id.} at 719 n.15.

\textsuperscript{241} \textit{Ross}, 827 F. Supp. at 719.

\textsuperscript{242} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{243} \textit{Id.} In a factually similar case, the Court of Appeals of Texas, although holding that a film canister containing cocaine was not immediately apparent, suggested that seizure may be appropriate under certain circumstances. \textit{See} Campbell \textit{v. State}, 864 S.W.2d 223, 226 (Tex. Ct. App. 1993) (seizure may have been appropriate if officer had viewed drug paraphernalia, which might have given the officer probable cause to believe that the defendant was concealing contraband).

\textsuperscript{245} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{246} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{247} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{248} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{249} \textit{Mitchell}, 832 F. Supp. at 1078.

In 1993, in State v. Wilson, the Court of Appeals of North Carolina held that the officer’s search of the defendant was no more intrusive than necessary, because the incriminating character of the lump in the defendant’s jacket pocket was immediately apparent to the officer.\(^{251}\) While performing a protective frisk, a police officer felt a lump in the breast pocket of the defendant’s jacket, which he immediately determined to be crack cocaine.\(^{252}\) Distinguishing this case from Dickerson, the court noted the absence of any testimony that the officer in this case manipulated the contents of the defendant’s pocket, or that he performed a search impermissible under Terry.\(^{253}\) The court concluded that the officer, upon using his tactile senses, had the requisite probable cause to believe that the lump in the defendant’s pocket was cocaine.\(^{254}\) Thus, the court held that the cocaine was admissible.\(^{255}\)

Unconditional reliance on an officer’s testimony, however, can lead to absurd results.\(^{256}\) For example, in 1994, in United States v. Brown, the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico upheld the seizure of two packages containing cocaine.\(^{257}\) The packages were wrapped in black tape and hidden under the defendant’s clothing.\(^{258}\) The officer who conducted the patdown search testified that the illegal nature of the contraband was immediately apparent to him when he touched the defendant’s midsection.\(^{259}\) Despite the fact that the packages were wrapped in tape, the court accepted the officer’s testimony that their illegal nature was immediately apparent.\(^{260}\) Thus, the court concluded that the seizure was justified.\(^{261}\)

IV. Dickerson: Its Flaws and Potential for Abuse

The Wilson case, and the introductory hypothetical regarding an officer’s search of a paranoid schizophrenic, illustrate the ambiguous

---

\(^{252}\) Id. at 387.

\(^{253}\) Id. at 389.

\(^{254}\) Id. at 390. The court’s conclusion was based on the officer’s experience in making drug arrests during his seven years of service, and on the fact that the officer was called to the scene to investigate alleged drug dealings. Id.

\(^{255}\) Id.

\(^{257}\) Id.

\(^{258}\) Id. at *1.

\(^{259}\) Id. at *6.

\(^{260}\) Id.

The principal difference between the two fact patterns is that the defendant was guilty in the former, and innocent in the latter. Though society’s concern for the rights of guilty defendants is low, the Court must recognize that the Dickerson decision could mean far more intrusive searches of innocent individuals. The Court’s decision in Dickerson can be criticized on three grounds. First, the Court’s reasoning is flawed based on existing Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. Second, the Court did not consider the practical implications of the Dickerson decision, and thus has turned its back on reality. Finally, the existing Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, upon which Dickerson relies, is itself in need of repair.

A. Internal Weaknesses

The Court’s reasoning in Dickerson is internally flawed based on existing Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. First, the Court ignores the dominant objective of the Terry stop—protection of police officers and the surrounding community. Because weapons are the only proper objects of a protective search, only weapons should be admissible into evidence. The exclusionary rule should be employed vigorously to achieve the Fourth Amendment’s regulatory objective by reducing undesirable incentives to perform unconstitutional searches and seizures. The risk is great that the plain feel doctrine will lead to far more intrusive, if not pretextual, searches. In order to reduce this risk of police misconduct, the exclusionary rule should apply to prevent police from introducing contraband other than weapons.

The rationale underlying the plain view doctrine is inapplicable in the context of plain feel. The primary justification for allowing the seizure of items in plain view is that the defendant has no legitimate expectation of privacy in those items that he or she left open to view. In contrast, an individual has a heightened expectation of privacy in concealed items. This increased privacy interest is evidenced by the further steps taken by the individual in order to hide the item from view. Thus, unlike items in plain view, the individual’s Fourth Amendment interests in items detected through plain feel may outweigh the

---

263 See Anthony C. Amsterdam, Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment, 58 Minn. L. Rev. 349, 437-38 (1974).
264 See Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2137.
government's interest in effective law enforcement. In adopting the plain feel doctrine, however, the Dickerson Court never performed an independent balancing test.\textsuperscript{266} Rather, the Court merely applied by analogy the plain view rationale to plain feel.\textsuperscript{267} Such an analysis improperly equates the differing privacy expectations inherent in objects left open to view and objects concealed from view.

Finally, the warrantless seizure of objects in plain feel may be unnecessary to protect the government's interest in preserving evidence. At least one commentator has suggested that a suspect will less likely destroy evidence detected by touch while a warrant is being procured than evidence detected by sight.\textsuperscript{268} One premise underlying the need for an officer to make a warrantless seizure of an item in plain view is that without such a seizure, the evidence may be destroyed.\textsuperscript{269} Obviously, a suspect who knows that a law enforcement officer has seen incriminating evidence will more likely destroy that evidence. A suspect who has been subject to a patdown search, however, may not even realize that the officer discovered incriminating evidence through his or her sense of touch.\textsuperscript{270} Thus, one of the justifications for the plain view doctrine may be inapplicable in the context of plain feel.

B. Practical Weaknesses

Ignoring the internal weaknesses of Dickerson discussed above, the decision also is lacking from a practical standpoint. Pragmatically, the Dickerson decision constitutes a double dilution of the warrant requirement. Terry already allows for warrantless searches based on less than probable cause. Because protective searches are not supported by probable cause, the Terry Court carefully limited the scope of the search to that which is necessary for the discovery of weapons. By not requiring the officer to specifically identify the felt object, the Terry Court intended to minimize the intrusion.\textsuperscript{271} Thus, the decision was based on the premise that the feel of a weapon, which is usually very hard and somewhat sizable, would undoubtedly be apparent to an officer who merely patted down a suspect.

\textsuperscript{266} Generally, the permissibility of a particular law enforcement practice is judged by balancing its intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against promotion of legitimate governmental interests. Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 654 (1979).
\textsuperscript{267} See Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2137.
\textsuperscript{268} See Haselkorn, supra note 124, at 697.
\textsuperscript{270} See Haselkorn, supra note 124, at 697.
\textsuperscript{271} Rather than specifically identifying the felt object, the officer merely must determine whether the object is, or is not, a weapon. See Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 29 (1968).
This fundamental premise fails for most items of contraband. The varying physical characteristics of contraband make it virtually impossible for an officer to immediately ascertain the criminal nature of the substance, given the more cursory treatment of a patdown search. Thus, in theory, Dickerson protects the individual because the Court requires an officer to have probable cause before seizing an object or conducting a more extensive search. In practice, however, an officer could not possibly gain probable cause from the mere touching of an object through clothing. Indeed, the viewing of an object of contraband will very often be insufficient to give rise to probable cause, because the illegal nature of the object may not be immediately apparent. Touching in the context of a protective search is inherently less reliable than viewing. While a law enforcement officer normally would view the contraband itself, he or she could only touch it through clothing. In addition, the identification of an object detected through the sense of touch is open to a wider range of interpretation than if detected through the sense of sight. Thus, as illustrated in the introductory hypothetical, the plain feel doctrine in the context of a cursory patdown search has great potential for error.

This potential for misinterpretation, along with a zealous police officer's desire to establish probable cause to justify a seizure, will inevitably lead to more intrusive searches than permitted by Terry. Moreover, to approve the use of evidence of some offense unrelated to weapons would be to invite the use of weapon searches as a pretext for unwarranted searches, and thus to severely erode the protection of the Fourth Amendment. Police officers will likely succeed in convincing a court—which has incriminating evidence in front of it—that their sense of touch made it immediately apparent to them that the felt object was contraband. If this occurs, the plain feel doctrine will 273 See Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730, 742-43 (1983) (incriminating nature of balloon was immediately apparent, only because officer's training and experience made him aware that balloons tied in that manner were frequently used to carry narcotics); United States v. Matthews, 942 F.2d 779, 783 (10th Cir. 1991) (incriminating nature of weapons immediately apparent only because located in close proximity to illegal drugs); United States v. Barnes, 909 F.2d 1059, 1070 (7th Cir. 1990) (incriminating nature of spiral notebook apparent only when officers searching for cocaine saw that notebook contained notations as to grams, ounces, and whether individuals paid or owed money). For example, suppose that a federal agent, armed with a warrant to search for and seize evidence of securities fraud, finds a spiral notebook with notations of weight measurements in plain view. The agent may not be privileged to seize the notebook on a hunch that it may be evidence of drug trafficking. See Brown, 460 U.S. at 742-43. On the other hand, if the agent finds a scale, a mirror and a razor blade next to the notebook, then the agent may have probable cause to believe that the notebook is evidence of drug trafficking. See id.

275 See, e.g., United States v. Brown, No. 93-378(HL), 1994 WL 880695, at *6 (D.P.R. May 20, surely allow police to make far greater intrusions than the brief Terry search would otherwise allow. This potential for abuse leads one to question the Terry decision itself.

C. Foundational Weaknesses

The Court could have used Dickerson as a vehicle for clarifying Terry. If the problem of pretextual searches is substantial enough to call for some Fourth Amendment remedy, then the Court could have limited or clarified the authority to make Terry stops. There is a need for additional guidelines on exactly what criteria give rise to reasonable suspicion to stop an individual. Police officers should not be permitted to stop an individual whose only "wrong" was the individual's evasion of the police, as any given individual may have one of several legitimate reasons to avoid the police. For example, an individual's prior interaction with police may cause apprehension. Moreover, racial tensions exist in some communities which may cause citizens to avoid any unnecessary confrontations with the police.

For these reasons, the Court should devise a standard that requires more than the mere evasiveness of an individual in order to justify a stop. A rebuttable presumption that evasiveness alone fails to give rise to reasonable suspicion is one possible standard. The prosecution could then rebut the presumption by a showing of glaring evasiveness, or by establishing that the individual's evasiveness demonstrated more than his or her exercise of the right to avoid police officers.

More importantly, the Court should re-examine the authority of a police officer to frisk an individual based on the lesser standard of reasonable suspicion. Justice Scalia, in his concurring opinion, seemed very concerned about the "frisk" portion of the Terry "stop-and-frisk" when he stated, "I frankly doubt . . . whether the fiercely proud men who adopted our Fourth Amendment would have allowed themselves to be subjected, on mere suspicion of being armed and dangerous, to such indignity . . . ."

Justice Scalia's concern lies, no doubt, in the 1994) (plain feel doctrine justified warrantless seizure of cocaine where officer testified that illegal nature was immediately apparent, despite fact that cocaine was contained in two packages wrapped in black tape and hidden under defendant's clothing). But see United States v. Mitchell, 832 F. Supp. 1073, 1079 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (plain feel doctrine did not justify warrantless seizure of crack cocaine, where cocaine was contained in plastic bags, wrapped in athletic sock, inside paper bag which defendant carried in lined inside pocket of heavy leather jacket, and police knew that lump was not weapon).

---

See id.

See id.

Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. at 2140 (Scalia, J., concurring).
realization that the physical touching of an individual represents an extreme invasion of privacy.

In light of the differences between touching and viewing, the Court could condition the authority to conduct a patdown search on the more stringent standard of probable cause, while granting the authority to stop an individual based on reasonable suspicion. For example, a suspect, stopped based on reasonable suspicion and then questioned by the officer, may be unable to alleviate the officer's fears. In such a situation, the temporary detention of a suspect would be elevated to a full custodial arrest based on probable cause. At that point, the officer could lawfully conduct not only a protective search for weapons, but also a full physical search incident to the arrest.

The Dickerson Court questioned neither the legality of the stop nor the frisk. The case provided an excellent opportunity, however, for the Court to add much needed clarification to the law of stop-and-frisk, and to impose some limits on police power. Of course, only in rare circumstances would a court decide questions not before it. The Dickerson Court, however, did not seem concerned about this policy, given its unnecessary creation of the plain feel doctrine.

V. ALTERNATIVES AND MODIFICATIONS TO PLAIN FEEL

The Court's creation of the plain feel doctrine in Dickerson was unnecessary in deciding the case. Instead, the Court merely could have reasoned that the search of Dickerson exceeded the bounds authorized by Terry. Other alternatives to the plain feel doctrine also are available to address society's interest in fighting crime. One alternative already is built into the Court's reasoning in Terry. Seizure of an object is justified under Terry when an officer conducts a further search based on his or her erroneous belief that a hidden object may be a weapon. If the object instead turns out to be contraband, the contraband is admissible into evidence. Second, the officer, upon sensing a suspicious bulge, can obtain a warrant based on probable cause that the object is contraband. As discussed above, because of the lack of exigency in these situations, in contrast to plain view situations, a warrant-

280 See id. (Scalia, J., concurring).
281 See id. (Scalia, J., concurring).
282 See id. (Scalia, J., concurring).
285 See, e.g., Oates, 560 F.2d at 62; Evans, 618 N.E.2d at 171.
less search would not be justified. Finally, the officer who senses a suspicious bulge may obtain the suspect's consent to conduct a further search for contraband. In this situation, because an individual has no legitimate expectation of privacy in items which the individual has allowed to be searched, a warrantless search would be justified.286

Recognizing the obvious advantages to law enforcement that Dickerson provides, some states may wish to adopt the plain feel doctrine. Many of these states, however, may wish to provide greater protection of individual rights than Dickerson would allow. Because the United States Constitution represents only a floor of individual rights, states, in interpreting their own constitutions, can provide greater protection than the United States Constitution requires.287 Thus, states can modify the plain feel doctrine, as articulated in Dickerson, in order to lessen its intrusion on individual rights.288

First, states can modify the level of justification required for an officer to seize an item. For example, although Dickerson requires an officer to have "probable cause" before seizing an item, a state may instead require an officer to have "reasonable certainty."289 In United States v. Williams, the D.C. Circuit described the latter standard as "good enough to eliminate all need for additional search activity."290 The court further explained that such a situation "can only occur when sensory information acquired by the officer rises to a state of certitude, rather than mere prediction [as with probable cause], in regard to the 286 See, e.g., United States v. Ponce, 8 F.3d 989, 998 (5th Cir. 1993) (defendant consented to search of his person which resulted in discovery of heroin in his pocket).

288 Two state courts have already discussed state constitutional issues raised by Dickerson. See People v. Mitchell, 630 N.E.2d 451, 454 (Ill. App. Ct. 1993) (state court adopts plain feel doctrine; state constitution affords no greater rights in search and seizure cases than the United States Constitution); In re S.D., 633 A.2d 172, 176, 176 n.3 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1993) (search exceeded bounds of Terry; court does not adopt plain feel doctrine, and suggests that state constitution may provide more protection to citizens than does the United States Constitution).
290 Id. at 1185.
object of the investigation." This higher level of certainty would provide greater protection of individual rights, and thus could be permitted under states' interpretation of their constitutions.

Second, state courts can develop assurances that the plain feel doctrine will work properly. States should implement a "motivation" requirement to ensure that a police officer does not conduct pretextual searches or searches beyond those permitted by Terry. In Dickerson, the Court never discussed the concept of a "motivation" requirement. By neither requiring nor rejecting the requirement, the Court has left room for refinement of the plain feel doctrine. States should seriously consider this potential for refinement in their adoption of the plain feel doctrine.

Warrantless seizures of weapons during a lawful Terry stop are allowed in order to protect the police officer and others nearby. Where the police officer only intends and anticipates the discovery of items other than weapons, however, the justification of protecting the police and the public loses its force. Thus, an inquiry into the intent of the officer conducting the search is necessary to determine pretext.

The proposed "motivation" requirement functions similarly to the inadvertence requirement originally articulated in Coolidge v. New Hampshire. The Court, in Horton v. California, eschewed the inadvertence requirement in the context of the plain view doctrine. The differing circumstances between plain view and plain feel seizures, however, demonstrate the merit of an analogous requirement for the plain feel doctrine.

In many, if not most, plain view situations, law enforcement officers procure a warrant before conducting a search. A warrant is issued by a neutral and detached magistrate, upon a showing of probable cause, and must describe with particularity the place to be searched and the items to be seized. These three requirements provide safeguards to ensure that the law enforcement officer making the plain view seizure had some justification for conducting a search.

---

291 Id. The court held that the officer met this standard, and thus concluded that admission of the evidence was proper. Id. at 1186. The court based its conclusion on the officer's testimony that he "could feel" numerous small rolled-up objects, and that he "believed" that the bag contained numerous quarter bags of heroin. Id. at 1186 n.121. When asked to explain the basis for his conclusion, the officer stated that "from feeling [the bag, he] could tell it was a large amount, small rolled-up objects that felt like plastic baggies." Id.

292 Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 29 (1968).

293 403 U.S. 443, 469-70 (1971).

295 See, e.g., id. at 131.

296 See, e.g., United States v. Christine, 687 F.2d 749, 758 (3d Cir. 1982).
In contrast, a search warrant will never precede a seizure authorized by the plain feel doctrine. The plain feel doctrine, by definition, is invoked in the context of a warrantless Terry stop-and-frisk. Because all three safeguards inherent in the warrant requirement are nonexistent in a Terry context, the likelihood is much greater that no justification existed for the initial search. Accordingly, the plain feel doctrine requires more protection against pretextual searches than necessary with the plain view doctrine. Thus, states, in adopting the plain feel doctrine, may wish to resurrect the inadvertence requirement of Coolidge, in order to guard against potential abuse.

States may fashion this requirement differently. For example, a court can evaluate the subjective intent of the officer by making inferences from testimony pertaining to the objective circumstances surrounding the search. This standard would provide the most protection of individual rights. Noting the difficulty of determining the officer's motive, however, the Supreme Court has suggested that the officer's subjective intent should be irrelevant. Yet, the problems inherent in determining the officer's subjective intent can be mitigated. Rather than focusing on an officer's state of mind, a court can focus on an objective evaluation of the officer's conduct and ignore the officer's underlying, personal motivations. For example, the Eleventh Circuit held that in determining whether an investigative stop is invalid as pretextual, the proper inquiry is whether a reasonable officer would have made the seizure in the absence of illegitimate motivation.

---

297 See Maryland v. Macon, 472 U.S. 463, 470-71 (1985) (sale of obscene material to police officer was not retrospectively transformed into warrantless seizure by virtue of officer's subjective intent to retrieve purchase money to use as evidence); United States v. Villamonte-Marquez, 462 U.S. 579, 585-84 (1983) (officer's boarding of defendant's vessel and subsequent seizure of marijuana was lawful, despite officer's potentially devious motivations for conducting search for narcotics); Scott v. United States, 436 U.S. 128, 136-37 (1978) (officer's state of mind or subjective intent during search is not relevant when judge reviews officer's conduct).

298 See United States v. Smith, 799 F.2d 704, 709 (11th Cir. 1986) (determination of pretextual search should be based on objective evaluation of officer's conduct).

299 See id. at 709. In Smith, the defendant drove past a police officer. Id. at 706. The officer had a hunch, based on a drug courier profile, that the defendant was transporting drugs. Id. He followed the defendant for one and one-half miles and, after observing the defendant weave six inches into the adjacent lane, he pulled over the defendant's car. Id. Subsequently, the officer arrested the defendant for possession of cocaine. Id. The court held that in determining whether an investigatory stop is unreasonably pretextual, the fact that the officer could have made the stop is irrelevant. Id. at 709. Rather, the proper inquiry is whether a reasonable officer would have made the stop. Id. Because a reasonable officer would not stop an individual who drifted a mere six inches into an adjacent lane, the court concluded that the stop was pretextual and excluded the evidence. Id.; see also United States v. Causey, 834 F.2d 1179, 1184-85 (5th Cir. 1987) (proper inquiry in determination of pretextual search is whether reasonable officer could have made seizure).
Although this standard may be less protective of individual rights, it would nonetheless provide defendants in extreme circumstances with some level of protection.

Under either of the above standards, state courts may place the burden of proof on either the government or the defendant. Although placing the burden of proof on the government would provide more protection of individual rights, shifting the burden to the defendant would avoid unnecessary delay in trials where pretext is clearly not at issue. If the defendant can make a showing that the officer intended to search only for items other than weapons, then the items should be subject to the exclusionary rule and inadmissible as evidence. Such conduct would constitute a deliberate attempt to circumvent the constitutional requirement of a warrant “particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized,” and cannot be condoned.

VI. CONCLUSION

In Minnesota v. Dickerson, the United States Supreme Court recognized a plain feel exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement. The doctrine provides that where an officer feels an object in the course of a Terry stop, and this touching provides probable cause for a further search or seizure, the further intrusion need not be authorized by a warrant. The Court held, however, that the frisk must remain within the bounds of the weapons frisk permitted by Terry.

In its reasoning, the Court turned its back on reality. Because it would be virtually impossible to gain probable cause from the mere touching of an object through clothing, it is difficult to imagine a situation where a plain feel seizure would be justified. To soften the potential for abuse, state courts wishing to adopt the plain feel doctrine may interpret their own constitutions to provide greater protection than the United States Constitution requires. In order to ensure that police officers do not conduct pretextual searches or searches beyond those permitted by Terry, state courts should impose a motivation requirement. If mitigating the problems inherent in determining the officer’s subjective intent is necessary, the burden of establishing a police officer’s illegitimate motive could be placed on the defendant.

---

300 The government may have the burden of proving the absence of an illegitimate motivation. Alternatively, the defendant may have the burden of establishing that the officer conducted a pretextual search.

301 See Horton, 496 U.S. at 148 (Brennan, J., dissenting).
and could be satisfied in the form of objective evidence. To authorize a plain feel seizure without allowing the defendant this opportunity would give law enforcement officers carte blanche to conduct illegal searches and seizures. This conduct must not be permitted, if the Fourth Amendment is to have any meaning at all.

JOHN A. CECERE